Introduction

I remember "Reminiscences of Tolstoy" as a masterpiece —I think I read it first in the Freeman, before Mr. B. W. Huebsch printed it as a book in 1920—and yet, when I took it up to read it again, and before I did so examined my mind about its contents, I found there was only one detail I really remembered. This was Tolstoy's hands. These I knew I remembered, for I had often thought and spoken of them. And here on the first page they were again, almost in the very words I had remembered. "He has wonderful hands—not beautiful, but knotted with swollen veins, and yet full of a singular expressiveness and the power of creativeness. Probably Leonardo da Vinci had hands like that. With such hands one can do anything."

But that wasn't quite all of it either. There was something, surely, about Tolstoy as he played cards. I was beginning to think I had seen this elsewhere, or even had invented it, when—in one of Gorky's "notes" there it also was. "How strange that he is so fond of playing cards. He plays seriously, passionately. His hands become nervous when he takes the cards up, exactly as if he were holding live birds instead of inanimate pieces of cardboard."

That seemed to be all, and in itself it would be enough to make a book worth rereading. But I soon discovered that Gorky had had still more to say on the subject of hands. He was a noticer of hands, as others are noticers of hair and eyes (he also saw the hair and the eyes). "I remember his keen eyes—they saw everything through and through—and the movements of his fingers, as though they were perpetually modeling something out of the air." That is Tolstoy again. But here is Andreyev: "He spoke hurriedly, with a dullish, booming voice, with a little crisp cough, his words slightly choking him, while he waved his hands monotonously as though he were conducting." Gorky could not overlook anybody's hands. Nor had Chekhov overlooked Gorky's. "You are an artist, and a clever man," he writes about some stories Gorky has sent him for criticism. "You feel magnificently, you are plastic, i.e., when you describe something you see and feel it with your hands. This is real art."

The real artist has real hands, and they are probably not pretty, as the legend would have it. For they have done things, and like faces which have felt and thought things they show it. Nothing that Gorky says about Tolstoy is more convincing than the things he says about his hands. For if Tolstoy is the greatest modern writer then he must have had such hands as these—ugly from having been much used, and alive from being used still. He is a giant among great men. For the rest here are also great—Gorky for seeing and saying what he does, and Chekhov and Andreyev for being what they also are, owners and noticers of hands, plastic in their every word and deed. They are not, for instance, like the unspeakable toadies who tormented Tolstoy, the disciples who haunted his house and embarrassed him, the people with "boneless perspiring hands and lying eyes."

There once more is Gorky on the subject of hands. And of eyes. For he never missed those either. Tolstoy's could not be lied to. And of course they could not lie.

To anyone who feels like protesting at this point that Gorky's great Reminiscences must be about more mental things than hands and eyes the answer is that of course they are, but that Gorky finds his way to the one subject through the other. He understands the connection. He is equally wonderful about Tolstoy's beliefs; but the reason we can follow him into this region with full confidence is that we have seen him rightly exploring the other region. His chief disclosure with respect to Tolstoy's beliefs is that they were not disclosed. They terrified Tolstoy himself, and made him lonely. They had much to do with God, but Tolstoy was not comfortable with God. That is to say, he really believed in God's power, and could resent or even hate it. He and God were two bears in one den, says Gorky with great wit. Tolstoy's ideas, in other words, were real ideas; they were hard to express, and the effort to express them—or to keep them unexpressed—issued in a number of unattractive things: the brutal peasant speech, the cunning inhuman smile, the knotted hands.

Unattractive, yet fascinating without end. Gorky, who did not want to see Tolstoy made a saint, wanted instead the man preserved—the man who was monstrous yet fine, the man whom one could both love and fear. That man is in these Reminiscences forever, along with Chekhov, Andreyev, and the author. No book of its kind has ever, I still think, been better.

Leo Tolstoy

"The flesh rages and riots, and the spirit follows it helpless and miserable."

Reminiscences of Leo Tolstoy *

The thought which beyond others most often and conspicuously gnaws at him is the thought of God. At moments it seems, indeed, not to be a thought of God. He speaks of it less than he would like, but thinks of it always. It can scarcely be said to be a sign of old age, a presentiment of death—no, I think that it comes from his exquisite human pride, and—a bit—from a sense of humiliation: for, being Leo Tolstoy, it is humiliating to have to submit one's will to a streptococcus. If he were a scientist, he would certainly evolve the most ingenious hypotheses, make great discoveries.

He has wonderful hands—not beautiful, but knotted with swollen veins, and yet full of a singular expressiveness and the power of creativeness. Probably Leonardo da Vinci had hands like that. With such hands one can do anything. Sometimes, when talking, he will move his fingers, gradually close them into a fist, and then, suddenly opening them, utter a good, full-weight word. He is like a god, not a Sabaoth or Olympian, but the kind of Russian god who

* Translated by S. S. Koteliansky and Leonard Woolf.

"sits on a maple throne under a golden lime tree," not very majestic, but perhaps more cunning than all the other gods.

He treats Sulerzhizky with the tenderness of a woman. For Chekhov his love is paternal—in this love is the feeling of the pride of a creator. Suler rouses in him just tenderness, a perpetual interest and rapture which never seems to weary the sorcerer. Perhaps there is something a little ridiculous in this feeling, like the love of an old maid for a parrot, a pug-dog, or a tom-cat. Suler is a fascinatingly wild bird from some strange, unknown land. A hundred men like him could change the face of, as well as the soul of, a provincial town. Its face they would smash and its soul they would fill with a passion for riotous, brilliant, headstrong wildness. One loves Suler easily and gaily, and when I see how carelessly women accept him, they surprise and anger me. Yet under this carelessness is hidden, perhaps, caution. Suler is not reliable. What will he do tomorrow? He may throw a bomb or he may join a troupe of public-house minstrels. He has energy enough for three life-times, and fire of life—so much that he seems to sweat sparks like over-heated iron.

Goldenweiser played Chopin, which called forth these remarks from Leo Nikolaevich [Tolstoy]: "A certain German princeling said: 'Where you want to have slaves, there you should have as much music as possible.' That's a true thought, a true observation—music dulls the mind. Especially do the Catholics realize that; our priests, of course, will not reconcile themselves to Mendelssohn in church. A Tula priest assured me that Christ was not a Jew, though the son of the Jewish God and his mother a Jewess—he did admit that, but says he: 'It's impossible.' I asked him: 'But how then . . . !' He shrugged his shoulders and said: 'That's just the mystery.' "

I remember his saying to me: "An intellectual is like the old Galician prince Vladimirko who, as far back as the twelfth century boldly declared: 'There are no miracles in our time.' Six hundred years have passed and all the intellectuals hammer away at each other: 'There are no miracles, there are no miracles.' And all the people believe in miracles just as they did in the twelfth century."

"The minority feel the need of God because they have got everything else, the majority because they have nothing." That was how Tolstoy put it; I would put it differently: The majority believe in God from cowardice, only the few believe in him from fullness of soul.

He advised me to read Buddhistic scriptures. Of Buddhism and Christ he always speaks sentimentally. When he speaks about Christ, it is always peculiarly poor—no enthusiasm, no feeling in his words, and no spark of real fire. I think he regards Christ as simple and deserving of pity; and, although at times he admires him, he hardly loves him. It is as though he were uneasy: if Christ came to a Russian village, the girls might laugh at him.

Today the Grand Duke Nikolai Mikhailovich was at Tolstoy's, evidently a very clever man. His behavior is very modest, he talks little. He has sympathetic eyes and a fine figure, quiet gestures. Leo Nikolaevich smiled caressingly at him, and spoke now French, now English. In Russian he said: "Karamzin wrote for the Czar, Soloviov long and tediously, and Kluchevsky for his own amusement. Cunning fellow Kluchevsky; at first, you get the impression that he is praising, but as you read on, you see that he is blaming."

Some one mentioned Zabielin. Tolstoy's comment was: "He's nice. An amateur collector; he collects everything whether it is useful or not. He describes food as if he had never had a square meal; but he is very, very amusing."

He reminds me of those pilgrims who all their life long, stick in hand, walk the earth, traveling thousands of miles from one monastery to another, from one saint's relics to another, terribly homeless and alien to all men and things. The world is not for them, nor God either. They pray to him from habit, and in their secret soul they hate him—why does he drive them over the earth, from one end to the other? What for? People are stumps, roots, stones on the path; one stumbles over them, and sometimes is hurt by them. One can do without them, but it is pleasant sometimes to surprise a man with one's own unlikeness to him, to show one's difference from him.

On one occasion he remarked: "Frederick of Prussia said very truly: 'Every one must save himself in his own way.' He also said: 'Argue as much as you like, but obey.' But when dying he confessed: 'I have grown weary of ruling slaves.' So-called great men are always terribly contradictory: that is forgiven them with all their other follies. Though contradictoriness is not folly: a fool is stubborn, but does not know how to contradict himself. Yes, Frederick was a strange man: among the Germans he won the reputation of being the best king, yet he could not bear them; he disliked even Goethe and Willand."

"Romanticism comes from the fear of looking straight into the eyes of truth," he said yesterday with regard to Balmont's poems. Suler disagreed with him and, lisping with excitement, read very feelingly some more poems.

"These, Liovushka," he said, "are not poems; they are charlatanism, rubbish, as people said in the middle ages, a nonsensical stringing together of words. Poetry is artless; when Fet wrote

> I know not myself what I will sing,
> But only my song is ripening, he expressed a genuine, real, people's sense of poetry. The peasant, too, doesn't know that he's a poet—oh, oi, ah, and aye—and there comes off a real song, straight from the soul, like a bird's. These new poets of yours are inventing. There are those silly French things called articles de Paris—well, that's what your stringers of verses produce. Nekrassov's miserable verses too are invented from beginning to end."

"And Béranger?" Suler asked.

"Béranger—that's quite different. What's there in common between the French and us? They are sensualists; the life of the spirit is not as important to them as the flesh. To a Frenchman, woman is everything. They are a worn out, emasculated people. Doctors say that all consumptives are sensualists."

Suler began to argue with his peculiar directness, pouring out a random flood of words. Leo Nikolaevich looked at him and said with a broad smile: "You are peevish today, like a girl who has reached the age when she should marry but has no lover."

The illness dried him up still more, burnt something out of him. Inwardly he seemed to become lighter, more transparent, more resigned. His eyes are still keener, his glance piercing. He listens attentively as though recalling something which he has forgotten or as though waiting for something new and unknown. In Yasnaya Polyana he seemed to me a man who knew everything and had nothing more to learn—a man who had settled every question.

If he were a fish, he would certainly swim only in the ocean, never coming to the narrow seas, and particularly not to the flat waters of earthly rivers. Around him here there rest or dart hither and thither the little fishes: what he says does not interest them, is not necessary to them, and his silence does not frighten or move them. Yet his silence is impressive, like that of a real hermit driven out from this world. Though he speaks a great deal and as a duty upon certain subjects, his silence is felt to be still greater. Certain things one cannot tell to anyone. Surely he has some thoughts of which he is afraid.

Someone sent him an excellent version of the story of Christ's godson. He read it aloud with pleasure to Suler, Chekhov—he read amazingly well. He was especially amused by the devils torturing the landowners. There was something which I did not like in that. He cannot be insincere, but, if this be sincere, then it makes it worse.

Then he said: "How well the peasants compose stories. Everything is simple, the words few, and a great deal of feeling. Real wisdom uses few words, for instance, 'God have mercy on us.' "

Yet the story is a cruel one.

His interest in me is ethnological. In his eyes I belong to a species not familiar to him—only that.

I read my story, The Bull, to him. He laughed much, and praised my knowledge of "the tricks of the language."

"But your treatment of words is not skillful; all your peasants speak cleverly. In actual life what they say is silly and incoherent, and at first you cannot make out what a peasant wants to say. That is done deliberately; under the silliness of their words is always concealed a desire to allow the other person to show what is in his mind. A good peasant will never show at once what is in his own mind: It is not profitable. He knows that people approach a stupid man frankly and directly, and that's the very thing he wants. You stand revealed before him, and he at once sees all your weak points. He is suspicious; he is afraid to tell his inmost thoughts even to his wife. But with your peasants in every story, everything is revealed; it's a universal council of wisdom. And they all speak in aphorisms; that's not true to life either; aphorisms are not natural to the Russian language."

"What about sayings and proverbs?"

"That's a different thing. They are not of today's manufacture."

"But you yourself often speak in aphorisms."

"Never. There again you touch everything up, people as well as nature—especially people. So did Lieskov, an affected, finicky writer whom nobody reads now. Don't let anyone influence you, fear no one, and then you'll be all right."

In his diary which he gave me to read, I was struck by a strange aphorism: "God is my desire." Today on returning him the book, I asked him what it meant.

"An unfinished thought," he said, glancing at the page and screwing up his eyes. "I must have wanted to say: God is my desire to know him. . . . No, not that. . . ." He began to laugh, and rolling up the book into a tube, he put it into the big pocket of his blouse. With God he has very suspicious relations; they sometimes remind me of the relation of "two bears in one den."

Of science he said: "Science is a bar of gold made by a charlatan alchemist. You want to simplify it, to make it accessible to all: you find that you have coined a lot of false coins. When the people realize the real value of these coins, they won't thank you."

We walked in the Yussopor Park. He spoke superbly about the customs of the Moscow aristocracy. A big Russian peasant woman was working on the flower bed, bent at right angles, showing her ivory legs, shaking her heavy breasts. He looked at her attentively.

"It is those caryatides who have kept all that magnificence and extravagance going. Not only by the labor of peasant men and women, not only by the taxes they pay, but in the literal sense by their blood. If the aristocracy had not from time to time mated with such horse-women as she, they would have died out long ago. It is impossible with impunity to waste one's strength as the young men of my time did. But after sowing their wild oats, many married serf-girls and produced a good breed. In that way, too, the peasant's strength saved them. That strength is everywhere in place. Half the aristocracy always has to spend its strength on itself, and the other half to dilute itself with peasant blood and thus diffuse the peasant blood a little. It's useful."

Of women he talks readily and much, like a French novelist, but always with the coarseness of a Russian peasant. Formerly it used to affect me unpleasantly. Today in the Almond Park he asked Anton Chekhov: "You whored a great deal when you were young?"

Anton Pavlovich, with a confused smile, and pulling at his little beard, muttered something inaudible and Leo Nikolaevich, looking at the sea, confessed: "I was an indefatigable . . ."

He said this penitently, using at the end of the sentence a salty peasant word. And I noticed for the first time how simply he used these words, as though he knew no more fitting ones to use. Coming from his shaggy lips, they sound simple and natural and lose their soldierly coarseness and filth. I remember my first meeting with him and his talk about Varienka Oliessova and Twenty-six Men and a Girl. From the ordinary point of view what he said was a string of indecent words. I was perplexed by it and even offended. I thought that he considered me incapable of understanding any other kind of language. I understand now: it was silly to have felt offended.

He sat on the stone bench in the shade of the cypresses, looking very lean, small, and gray, and yet resembling Jehovah Sabaoth who is a little tired and is amusing himself by trying to whistle in tune with a chaffinch. The bird sang in the darkness of the thick foliage: he peered up at it, screwing up his sharp little eyes and, pursing his lips like a child, he whistled incompetently.

"What a furious little creature! It's in a rage. What is it?"

I told him about the chaffinch and its characteristic jealousy.

"All life long one song," he said, "and yet jealous. Man has a thousand songs in his heart and is yet blamed for jealousy; is it fair?" He spoke musingly, as though asking himself questions. "There are moments when a man says to a woman more than she ought to know about him. He speaks and forgets, but she remembers. Perhaps jealousy comes from the fear of degrading one's soul, of being humiliated and ridiculous? Not that a woman is dangerous who holds a man by his lusts but she who holds him by his soul. . . ."

When I pointed out the contradiction in this with his Kreutzer Sonata, the radiance of a sudden smile beamed through his beard and he said: "I am not a chaffinch."

In the evening while walking, he suddenly said: "Man survives earthquakes, epidemics, the horrors of disease, and all the agonies of the soul, but for all time his most tormenting tragedy has been, is, and will be—the tragedy of the bedroom."

Saying this he smiled triumphantly: at times, he has the broad calm smile of a man who has overcome something extremely difficult or from whom some sharp, long-gnawing pain has lifted suddenly. Every thought burrows into his soul like a tick; he either tears it out at once, or allows it to have its fill of his blood, and then, when full, it just drops off of itself.

He read to Suler and me a variant of the scene of the fall of Father Sergius—a merciless scene. Suler pouted and fidgeted uneasily.

"What's the matter? Don't you like it?" Leo Nikolaevich asked.

"It's too brutal, as though from Dostoievsky. She is a filthy girl, and her breasts like pancakes, and all that. Why didn't he sin with a beautiful, healthy woman?"

"That would be sin without justification; as it is, there is a justification in pity for the girl. Who could desire her as she is?"

"I can not make it out. . . ."

"There's a great deal, Liovushka, which you can't make out; you're not shrewd. . . ."

There came in Andrey Lvovich's wife and the conversation was interrupted. As she and Suler went out, Leo Nikolaevich said to me: "Leopold is the purest man I know. He is like that: if he did something bad, it would be out of pity for someone."

He talks most of God, of peasants, and of woman. Of literature rarely and little, as though literature were something alien to him. Woman, in my opinion, he regards with implacable hostility and he loves to punish her, unless she be a Kittie or Natasha Rostov, i.e., a creature not too narrow. It is the hostility of the male who has not succeeded in getting all the pleasure he could, or it is the hostility of spirit against "the degrading impulses of the flesh." But it is hostility, and cold as in Anna Karenina. Of "the degrading impulses of the flesh" he spoke well on Sunday in a conversation with Chekhov and Yelpatievsky about Rousseau's Confessions. Suler wrote down what he said, and later, while preparing coffee, burnt it in the spirit lamp. Once before he burnt Leo Nikolaevich's opinions on Ibsen, and he also lost the notes of the conversation in which Leo Nikolaevich said very pagan things on the symbolism of the marriage ritual, agreeing to a certain extent with V. V. Rosanov.

In the morning some "stundists" came to Tolstoy from Feodosia, and today all day long he spoke about peasants with rapture.

At lunch: "They came both so strong and fleshy; says one: 'Well, we've come uninvited,' and the other says: 'With God's help, we shall leave unbeated.' " And he broke out into childlike laughter, shaking all over.

After lunch, on the terrace: "We shall soon cease completely to understand the language of the people. Now we say 'the theory of progress,' 'the role of the individual in history,' 'the evolution of science'; and a peasant says: 'You can't hide an awl in a sack'; and all theories, histories, evolutions become pitiable and ridiculous, because they are incomprehensible and unnecessary to the people. But the peasant is stronger than we; he is more tenacious of life, and there may happen to us what happened to the tribe of Atzurs, of whom it was reported to a scholar: 'All the Atzurs have died out, but there is a parrot here who knows a few words of their language.' "

"With her body, woman is more sincere than man; but with her mind, she lies. And when she lies, she does not believe herself; but Rousseau lied and believed his lies."

"Dostoievsky described one of his mad characters as living and taking vengeance on himself and others because he had served a cause in which he did not believe. He wrote that about himself; that is, he could have said the same of himself."

"Some of the words used in church are amazingly obscure: what meaning is there, for instance, in the words: 'The earth is God's and the fullness thereof'? That is not Holy Scripture, but a kind of popular scientific materialism."

"But you explained the words somewhere," said Suler.

"Many things are explained. . . . 'An explanation does not go up to the hilt.' "

And he gave a cunning little smile.

He likes putting difficult and malicious questions:

What do you think of yourself?

Do you love your wife?

Do you think my son, Leo, has talent?

How do you like Sophie Andreyavna? [Tolstoy's wife.] To lie to him is impossible.

Once he asked: "Are you fond of me, Alexei Maximovich?"

This is the maliciousness of a "bogatyr" [a hero in Russian legend, brave but wild and self-willed, like a child]: Vaska Buslayev played just such pranks in his youth, mischievous fellow. He is experimenting, all the time testing something, as if he were going to fight. It is interesting, but not much to my liking. He is the devil, and I am still a babe, and he should leave me alone.

Perhaps peasant to him means merely—bad smell. He always feels it, and involuntarily has to talk of it.

Last night I told him of my battle with General Kornet's wife; he laughed until he cried and he got a pain in his side and groaned and kept on crying out in a thin scream: "With the shovel! On the bottom with the shovel, eh? Right on the bottom! Was it a broad shovel?"

Then after a pause, he said seriously: "It was generous in you to strike her like that; any other man would have struck her on the head for that. Very generous! You understood that she wanted you?"

"I don't remember. I hardly think that I can have understood."

"Well now! But it's obvious. Of course she wanted you."

"I did not live for that then."

"Whatever you may live for, it's all the same. You are evidently not much of a lady's man. Anyone else in your place would have made his fortune out of the situation, would have become a landed proprietor and have ended by making one of a pair of drunkards."

After a silence: "You are funny—don't be offended—very funny. And it's very strange that you should still be good-natured when you might well be spiteful. . . . You're strong . . . that's good. . . ."

And after another silence, he added thoughtfully: "Your mind I don't understand—it's a very tangled mind—but your heart is sensible . . . yes, a sensible heart."

Note:

When I lived in Kazan, I entered the service of General Kornet's wife as doorkeeper and gardener. She was a Frenchwoman, a general's widow, a young woman, fat and with the tiny feet of a little girl. Her eyes were amazingly beautiful, restless and always greedily alert. Before her marriage she was, I think, a huckstress or cook or, possibly, even a woman of the town. She would get drunk early in the morning and come out in the yard or garden dressed only in a chemise with an orange-colored gown over it, in Tartar slippers made of red morocco, and on her head a mane of thick hair. Her hair, carelessly done, hung about her red cheeks and shoulders. A young witch! She used to walk about the garden, humming French songs and watching me work, and every now and then she would go to the kitchen window and call:

"Pauline, give me something."

"Something" always meant the same thing—a glass of wine with ice in it.

In the basement of her house there lived three young ladies, the princesses D. G., whose mother was dead and whose father, a commissariat general, had gone off elsewhere. General Kornet's widow took a dislike to the girls and tried to get rid of them by doing every kind of offensive thing to them. She spoke Russian badly, but swore superbly, like an expert drayman. I very much disliked her attitude toward these harmless girls—they looked so sad, frightened, and defenseless.

One afternoon, two of them were walking in the garden when suddenly the general's widow appeared, drunk as usual, and began to shout at them to drive them out of the garden. They began walking silently away, but the general's widow stood in the gateway, completely blocking it with her body like a cork, and started swearing at them and using Russian words like a regular drayman. I asked her to stop swearing and let the girls out, but she shouted:

"You, I know you! You get through their window at night."

I was angry, and, taking her by the shoulders, pushed her away from the gate; but she broke away and, facing me, quickly undid her dress, lifted up her chemise, and shouted:

"I'm nicer than those rats."

Then I lost my temper. I took her by the neck, turned her round, and struck her with my shovel below the back, so that she skipped out of the gate and ran across the yard, crying out three times in great surprise: "O! O! O!"

After that, I got my passport from her confidante Pauline—also a drunken but very wily woman—took my bundle under my arm, and left the place; and the general's widow, standing at the window with a red shawl in her hand, shouted:

"I won't call the police—it's all right—listen—come back—don't be afraid."

I asked him: "Do you agree with Poznyshiev [in The Kreutzer Sonata] when he says that doctors have destroyed and are destroying thousands and hundreds of thousands of people?"

"Are you very anxious to know?"

"Very."

"Then I shan't tell you."

And he smiled, playing with his thumbs.

I remember in one of his stories he makes a comparison between a quack village "vet" and a doctor of medicine: "The words 'giltchak,' 'potchetchny,' 'blood-letting' [words used by quack 'vets' for the diseases of horses] are not they precisely the same as nerves, rheumatism, organisms, and so on?" And this was written after Jenner, Behring, Pasteur. It is perversity!

How strange that he is so fond of playing cards. He plays seriously, passionately. His hands become nervous when he takes the cards up, exactly as he were holding live birds instead of inanimate pieces of cardboard.

"Dickens said a very clever thing: 'Life is given to us on the definite understanding that we boldly defend it to the last.' On the whole, he was sentimental, loquacious, and not a very clever writer, but he knew how to construct a novel as no one else could, certainly better than Balzac. Someone has said: 'Many are possessed by the passion for writing books, but few are ashamed of them afterwards.'

Balzac was not ashamed, nor was Dickens, and both of them wrote quite a number of bad books. Still, Balzac is a genius. Or at any rate, the thing which you can only call genius. . . ."

Sometimes he seems to be conceited and intolerant like a Volga preacher, and this is terrible in a man who is the sounding bell of this world. Yesterday he said to me: "I am more of a mouzhik than you and I feel better in a mouzhik way."

God, he ought not to boast of it, he must not!

I read him some scenes from my play, The Lower Depths; he listened attentively and then asked: "Why do you write that?"

I explained as best I could.

"One always notices that you jump like a cock onto everything. And more—you always want to paint all the grooves and cracks over with your own paint. You remember that Andersen says: 'The gilt will come off and the pigskin will remain,' just as our peasants say: 'Everything will pass away, the truth alone will remain.' You'd much better not put the plaster on, for you yourself will suffer for it later. Again, your language is very skillful, with all kinds of tricks—that's no good. You ought to write more simply; people speak simply, even incoherently, and that's good. A peasant doesn't ask: 'Why is a third more than a fourth, if four is always more than three,' as one learned young lady asked. No tricks please."

He spoke irritably; clearly he disliked very much what I had read to him. And after a silence, looking over my head, he said gloomily: "Your old man is not sympathetic, one does not believe in his goodness. The actor is all right, he's good. You know Fruits of Enlightenment? My cook there is rather like your actor. Writing plays is difficult. But your prostitute also came off well, they must be like that. Have you known many of them?"

"I used to."

"Yes, one can see that. Truth always shows itself. Most of what you say comes out of yourself, and therefore you have no characters, and all your people have the same face. I should think you don't understand women; they don't come off with you. One does not remember them. . . ."

At this moment A. L.'s wife came in and called us to come to tea, and he got up and went out very quickly as if he were glad to end the conversation.

"What is the most terrible dream you have ever had?" Tolstoy asked me.

I rarely have dreams and remember them badly, but two have remained in my memory and probably will for the rest of my life.

I dreamt once that I saw the sky scrofulous, putrescent, greenish-yellow, and the stars in it were round, flat, without rays, without luster, like scabs on the skin of a diseased person. And there glided across the putrescent sky slowly reddish forked lightning, rather like a snake, and when it touched a star, the star swelled up into a ball and burst noiselessly, leaving behind it a darkish spot, like a little smoke; and then the spot vanished quickly in the bleared and liquid sky. Thus all the stars one after another burst and perished and the sky, growing darker and more horrible, at last whirled upward, bubbled up, and, bursting into fragments, began to fall on my head in a kind of cold jelly, and in the spaces between the fragments there appeared a shiny blackness as though of iron.

Leo Nikolaevich said: "Now that comes from a learned book; you must have read something on astronomy; hence the nightmare. And the other dream?"

The other dream: a snowy plain, smooth like a sheet of paper; no hillock, no tree, no bush anywhere, only—barely visible—a few rods poked out from under the snow. And across the snow of this dead desert, from horizon to horizon, there stretched a yellow strip of hardly distinguishable road, and over the road there marched slowly a pair of gray felt-top boots—empty.

He raised his shaggy, werewolf eyebrows, looked at me intently, and thought for a while.

"That's terrible. . . . Did you really dream that; you didn't invent it? But there's something bookish in it also."

And suddenly he got angry, and said, irritably, sternly, rapping his knee with his finger: "But you're not a drinking man? It's unlikely that you ever drank much. And yet there's something drunken in these dreams. There was a German writer, Hoffmann, who dreamt that card tables ran about the street and all that sort of thing, but then he was a drunkard—a 'calaholic,' as our literate coachmen say. Empty boots marching—that's really terrible. Even if you did invent it, it's good. Terrible!"

Suddenly he gave a broad smile, so that even his cheekbones beamed: "And imagine this: suddenly, in the Tverskaya Street, there runs a card table with its curved legs, its boards clap-clap, raising a chalky dust, and you can even still see the numbers on the green cloth—excise clerks playing whist on it for three days and nights on end—the table could not bear it any longer and ran away."

He laughed and then, probably noticing that I was a little hurt by his distrust of me: "Are you hurt because I thought your dreams bookish? Don't be annoyed; sometimes, I know, one invents something without being aware of it, something which one cannot believe, which can't possibly be believed, and then one imagines that one dreamt it and did not invent it at all. There was a story which an old landowner told: he dreamt that he was walking in a wood and came out of it onto a steppe. On the steppe he saw two hills which suddenly turned into a woman's breasts, and between them rose up a black face which instead of eyes had two moons like white spots. The old man dreamt that he was standing between the woman's legs, in front of him a deep dark ravine which sucked him in. After the dream his hair began to grow gray and his hands to tremble, and he went abroad to Doctor Kneipp to take a water cure. But really he must have seen something of the kind—he was a dissolute fellow."

He patted me on the shoulder.

"But you are neither a drunkard nor dissolute—how do you come to have such dreams?"

"I don't know."

"We know nothing about ourselves."

He sighed, screwed up his eyes, thought for a bit, and then added in a low voice: "We know nothing."

This evening, during our walk, he took my arm and said: "The boots are marching—terrible, eh? Quite empty—tiop, tiop—and the snow scrunching. Yes, it's good; but you are very bookish, very. Don't be cross, but it's bad and will stand in your way."

I am scarcely more bookish than he, and at the time I thought him a cruel rationalist despite all his pleasant little phrases.

At times he gives one the impression of having just arrived from some distant country, where people think and feel differently and their relations and language are different. He sits in a corner tired and gray, as though the dust of another earth were on him, and he looks attentively at everything with the look of a foreigner or of a dumb man. Yesterday, before dinner, he came into the drawing room, just like that, his thoughts far away. He sat down on the sofa, and, after a moment's silence, suddenly said, swaying his body a little, rubbing the palm of his hand on his knee, and wrinkling up his face: "Still that is not all—not all."

Someone, always stolidly stupid as a flatiron, asked: "What do you say?"

He looked at him fixedly, and then, bending forward and looking onto the terrace where I was sitting with Doctor Nikitin and Yelpatievsky, he said: "What are you talking about?"

"Plehve."

"Plehve . . . Plehve . . ." he repeated musingly after a pause, as though he heard the name for the first time. Then he shook himself, like a bird, and asked with a faint smile: "Today from early morning I have had a silly thing running in my head; someone once told me that he saw the following epitaph in a cemetery:

Beneath this stone there rests Ivan Yegovner;
A tanner by trade, he always wetted hides.
His work was honest, his heart good, but, behold,
He passed away leaving his business to his wife.
He was not yet old and might still have done a lot of work
But God took him away to the life of paradise on the night
Friday to Saturday in Passion week—and something like that. . . ." He was silent, and then, nodding his head and smiling faintly, added: "In human stupidity, when it is not malicious, there is something very touching, even beautiful. . . . There always is."

They called us to come to dinner.

"I do not like people when they are drunk, but I know some who become interesting when they are tipsy, who acquire what is not natural to them in their sober state; wit, beauty of thought, alertness, and richness of language. In such cases I am ready to bless wine."

Suler tells how he was once walking with Leo Nikolaevich in Tverskaya Street when Tolstoy noticed in the distance two soldiers of the Guards. The metal of their accouterments shone in the sun; their spurs jingled; they kept step like one man; their faces, too, shone with the self-assurance of strength and youth. Tolstoy began to grumble at them: "What pompous stupidity! Like animals trained by the whip. . . ."

But when the guardsmen came abreast with him, he stopped, followed them caressingly with his eyes, and said enthusiastically: "How handsome! Old Romans, eh, Liovushka? Their strength and beauty! O Lord! How charming it is when man is handsome, how very charming!"

An Unfinished Letter *

I have just posted a letter to you—telegrams have arrived telling of "Tolstoy's flight," and now, once more, one with you in thought I write again.

Probably all I want to say about the news will seem to you confused, perhaps even harsh and ill-tempered, but you will forgive me. I am feeling as though I had been gripped by the throat and nearly strangled.

I had many long conversations with him; when he was living at Gaspra in the Crimea I often went to him and he liked coming to me; I have studied his books lovingly; it seems to me that I have the right to say what I think of him even if it be bold and differ widely from the general opinion. I know as well as others that no man is more worthy than he of the name of genius; no one was more complicated, contradictory, and great in everything—yes, in everything. Great, in some curious sense, broad, indefinable by words, there is something in him which made me desire to cry aloud to everyone: "Look what a wonderful man is living on the earth!" For he is, so to say, universally and above all, a man, a man of mankind.

But what always repelled me in him was that stubborn

* Translated by S. S. Koteliansky and Leonard Woolf.

despotic inclination to turn the life of Count Leo Nikolaevich into "the saintly life of our blessed father, boyard Leo."

As you know, he had for long intended to suffer; he expressed his regret to E. Soloviov, and to Suler, that he had not succeeded; but he wanted to suffer simply, not out of a natural desire to test the resistance of his will, but with the obvious and, I repeat, the despotic intention of increasing the influence of his religious ideas, the weight of his teaching, in order to make his preaching irresistible, to make it holy in the eyes of man through his suffering; to force them to accept it—you understand, to force them. For he realized that preaching is not sufficiently convincing; in his diary you will, some day, read good examples of skepticism applied by him to his own preaching and personality. He knows that "martyrs and sufferers, with rare exceptions, are despots and tyrants"—he knows everything!—and yet he says to himself, "Were I to suffer for my ideas, they would have a greater influence." It was this in him that always repelled me, for I can not help feeling that it was an attempt to use violence upon me, a desire to get hold of my conscience, to dazzle it with the glory of righteous blood, to put upon my neck the yoke of a dogma.

He always greatly exalted immortality on the other side of this life, but he preferred it on this side. A writer, national in the truest and most complete sense, he embodied in his great soul all the defects of his nation, all the mutilations we have suffered by the ordeals of our history; his misty preaching of "non-activity," of "non-resistance to evil," the doctrine of passivism, all this is the unhealthy ferment of the old Russian blood, envenomed by Mongolian fatalism and almost chemically hostile to the West with its untiring creative labor, with its active and indomitable resistance to the evils of life. What is called Tolstoy's "anarchism" essentially and fundamentally expresses our Slav anti-statism, which, again, is really a national characteristic, ingrained in our flesh from old times, our desire to scatter nomadically. Up to now we have indulged that desire passionately, as you and everyone else know. We Russians know it too, but we always break away along the line of least resistance; we see that this is pernicious, but still we crawl farther and farther away from one another; and these mournful cockroach journeyings are called "the history of Russia," the history of a state which has been established almost incidentally, mechanically—to the surprise of the majority of its honest-minded citizens—by the forces of the Variags, Tartars, Baltic Germans, and petty officials. To their surprise, I say, because all the time we have been "scattering"; and only when we reached places beyond which we could find nothing worse—when we could go no farther—well, then we stopped and settled down. This is the destiny to which we are doomed, to settle in the snows and marches, by the side of the wild Erza, Tchood, Mervey, Vess, and Muroma.

Yet men arose among us who realized that light must come to us not from the East, but from the West, and now he, Leo Nikolaevich, the crown of our ancient history, wishes, consciously or unconsciously, to stretch himself like a vast mountain across our nation's path to Europe, to the active life which sternly demands of men the supreme effort of their spiritual forces. His attitude toward science, too, is certainly national; one sees magnificently reflected in him the old, Russian village-skepticism which comes from ignorance. Everything is national in him and all his preaching is a reaction from the past, an atavism which we had already begun to shake off and overcome.

Think of his letter, "The Intelligentsia, the State, the People," written in 1905—what a pernicious, malignant thing it is! You can hear in it the sectarian's "I told you so." I wrote an answer to him at the time, based on his own words to me, that he had long since forfeited the right to speak of and on behalf of the Russian people; for I am a witness of his lack of desire to listen to and understand the people who came to talk to him soul to soul. My letter was bitter, and in the end I did not send it to him.

Well, now he is probably making his last assault in order to give to his ideas the highest possible significance. Like Vassily Buslaiev, he usually loved these assaults, but always so that he might assert his holiness and obtain a halo. That is dictatorial, although his teaching is justified by the ancient history of Russia and by his own sufferings of genius. Holiness is attained by flirting with sin, by subduing the will to live. People do desire to live, but he tries to persuade them: "That's all nonsense, our earthly life." It is very easy to persuade a Russian of this; he is a lazy creature who loves beyond anything else to find an excuse for his own inactivity. On the whole, of course, a Russian is not a Platon Karatayev, nor an Akim, nor a Bezonkhy, nor a Neklyudov; all these men were created by history and nature, not exactly on Tolstoy's pattern, he only improved on them in order more thoroughly to support his teaching. But, undeniably, Russia as a whole is—Tiulin above and Oblomov below. For the Tiulin above look at the year 1905, and for the Oblomov below look at Count A. N. Tolstoy, at Bunin, at everyone round about you. Beasts and swindlers—we can leave them out of consideration, though our beast is exceedingly national (what a filthy coward he is, for all his cruelty); swindlers, of course, are international.

In Leo Nikolaevich there is much which at times roused in me a feeling very like hatred, and this hatred fell upon my soul with crushing weight. His disproportionately overgrown individuality is a monstrous phenomenon, almost ugly, and there is in him something of Sviatogor, the bogatyr, whom the earth can't hold. Yes, he is great. I am deeply convinced that beyond all that he speaks of, there is much which he is silent about, even in his diary; he is silent and probably will never tell it to anyone. That "something" only occasionally and in hints slipped through into his conversation, and hints of it are also to be found in the two note-books of his diary which he gave me and L. A. Sulerzhizky to read; it seems to me a kind of "negation of all affirmations," the deepest and most evil nihilism which has sprung from the soil of an infinite and unrelieved despair, from a loneliness which probably no one but he has experienced with such terrifying clearness. I have often thought him to be a man who in the depths of his soul is stubbornly indifferent to people; he is so much above and beyond them that they seem to him like midgets and their activities ridiculous and miserable. He has gone too far away from them into some desert; and there, solitary, with the highest effort of all the force of his spirit, he closely examines into "the most essential," into death.

All his life he feared and hated death, all his life there throbbed in his soul the "Arsamasian terror"—must he die? The whole world, all the earth looks toward him; from China, India, America, from everywhere living, throbbing threads stretch out to him; his soul is for all and forever. Why should not nature make an exception to her law, give to one man physical immortality? Why not? He is certainly too rational and sensible to believe in miracles, but on the other hand he is a bogatyr, an explorer; and, like a young recruit, wild and headstrong from fear, and despair in fact, of the unknown barrack. I remember, in Gaspra, he read Leo Shestov's book Good and Evil in the Teaching of Nietzsche and Tolstoy, and, when Anton Chekhov remarked that he did not like the book, Tolstoy said: "I thought it amusing. It's written swaggeringly, but it's all right and interesting. I'm sure I like cynics when they are sincere." Then he said: "Truth is not wanted; quite true, what should he want truth for? For he will die all the same."

And evidently seeing that his words had not been understood, he added with a quick smile: "If a man has learnt to think, no matter what he may think about, he is always thinking of his own death. All philosophers were like that. And what truths can there be, if there is death?"

He went on to say that truth is the same for all—love of God. But on this subject he spoke coldly and wearily. After lunch on the terrace he took up Shestov's book again and finding the passage: "Tolstoy, Dostoievsky, Nietzsche could not live without an answer to their questions, and for them any answer was better than none," he laughed and said: "What a daring coiffeur, he says straight out that I deceived myself, and that means that I deceived others too. That is the obvious conclusion. . . ."

"Why coiffeur?" asked Suler.

"Well," he answered thoughtfully, "it just came to my mind that he is fashionable, chic, and I remembered the coiffeur from Moscow at a wedding of his peasant uncle in the village. He has the finest manners and he dances fashionably, and so he despises everyone."

I repeat this conversation, I think, almost literally; it is most memorable for me, and I even wrote it down at the time, as I did many other things which struck me. Sulerzhizky and I wrote down many things which Tolstoy said, but Suler lost his notes when he came to me at Arsamas; he was habitually careless and, although he loved Leo Nikolaevich like a woman, he behaved toward him rather strangely, almost like a superior. I have also mislaid my notes somewhere and cannot find them; someone in Russia must have got them. I watched Tolstoy very attentively, because I was looking for—I am still looking for and will until my death—a man with an active and a living faith. And also because once Anton Chekhov, speaking of our lack of culture, complained: "Goethe's words were all recorded, but Tolstoy's thoughts are being lost in the air. That, my dear fellow, is intolerably Russian. After his death they will all bestir themselves, will begin to write reminiscences, and will lie."

But to return to Shestov. "It is impossible," he says, "to live looking at horrible ghosts, but how does he know whether it's horrible or not? If he knew, if he saw ghosts, he would not write this nonsense, but would do something serious, what Buddha did all his life."

Someone remarked that Shestov was a Jew.

"Hardly," said Leo Nikolaevich doubtfully. "No, he is not a Jew; there are no disbelieving Jews, you can't name one . . . no."

It seemed sometimes as though this old sorcerer were playing with death, coquetting with her, trying somehow to deceive her, saying: "I am not afraid of thee, I love thee, I long for thee," and at the same time, peering at death with his keen little eyes: "What art thou like? What follows thee hereafter? Wilt thou destroy me altogether, or will something in me go on living?"

A strange impression used to be produced by his words: "I am happy, I am very happy, I am too happy." And then immediately afterward: "To suffer." To suffer—that too was true in him, I don't doubt it for a second, that he, only half convalescent, would have been really glad to be put into prison, to be banished, in a word to embrace a martyr's crown. Would not martyrdom probably in some measure justify death, make her more understandable, acceptable, from the external, from the formal point of view? But he was never happy, never and nowhere, I am certain of that: neither "in the books of wisdom," nor "on the back of a horse," nor "in the arms of a woman" did he experience the full delights of "earthly paradise." He is too rational for that and knows life and people too well. Here are some more of his words: "The Kaliph Abdurahman had during his life fourteen happy days, but I am sure I have not had so many. And this is because I have never lived—I cannot live—for myself, for my own self; I live for show, for people."

When we left, Anton Chekhov said to me: "I don't believe that he was never happy." But I believe it. He was not. Though it is not true that he lived for show. Yes, what he himself did not need, he gave to people as though they were beggars; he liked to compel them, to compel them to read, walk, be vegetarians, love the peasants, and believe in the infallibility of the rational-religious reflections of Leo Tolstoy. People must be given something which will either satisfy or amuse them, and then let them be off. Let them leave a man in peace, to his habitual, tormenting, and sometimes cozy loneliness facing the bottomless pit of the problem of "the essential."

All Russian preachers, with the exception of Avvakum and perhaps Tikhon Zadonsky, are cold men, for they did not possess an active and living faith. When I was writing Luka in The Lower Depths, I wanted to describe an old man like that: he is interested in "every solution" but not in people; coming inevitably in contact with them, he consoles them, but only in order that they may leave him in peace. And all the philosophy, all the preaching of such men is alms bestowed by them with a veiled aversion, and there sounds behind their preaching words which are beggarly and melancholy: "Get out! Love God or your neighbor, but get out! Curse God, love the stranger, but leave me alone! Leave me alone, for I am a man and I am doomed to death."

Alas, so it is and so it will be. It could not and cannot be otherwise, for men have become worn out, exhausted, terribly separated, and they are all chained to a loneliness which dries up the soul. If Leo Nikolaevich had had a reconciliation with the Church, it would not have at all surprised me. The thing would have had a logic of its own;

all men are equally insignificant, even archbishops. In fact, it would not have been a reconciliation, strictly speaking; for him personally the act would have been only logical: "I forgive those who hate me." It would have been a Christian act, and behind it there would have hidden a quick, ironical little smile, which would be understood as the way in which a wise man retaliates on the fools.

What I write is not what I want to say; I cannot express it properly. There is a dog howling in my soul, and I have a foreboding of some misfortune. Yes, newspapers have just arrived and it is already clear: you at home are beginning to "create a legend"; idlers and good-for-nothings have gone on living and have now produced a saint. Only think how pernicious it is for the country just at this moment, when the heads of disillusioned men are bowed down, the souls of the majority empty, and the souls of the best full of sorrow. Lacerated and starving they long for a legend. They long so much for alleviation of pain, for the soothing of torment. And they will create just what he desires, but what is not wanted—the life of a holy man and saint.

But surely he is great and holy because he is a man, a madly and tormentingly beautiful man; a man of the whole of mankind. I am somehow contradicting myself in this, but it does not matter. He is a man seeking God, not for himself, but for men, so that God may leave him, the man, alone in the peace of the desert chosen by him. He gave us the Gospels in order that we might forget the contradictions in Christ; he simplified Christ's image, smoothing away the militant elements and bringing into the foreground the humble "will of Him that sent him." No doubt Tolstoy's gospel is the more easily accepted because it is "soothing to the malady" of the Russian people. He had to give them something, for they complain and trouble the earth with their groaning, and distract him from "the essential." But War and Peace and all the other things of the same kind will not sooth the sorrow and despair of the gray Russian land. Of War and Peace he himself said: "Without false modesty, it is like the Iliad." N. Y. Tchaikovsky heard from his lips exactly the same appreciation of Childhood and Youth.

Journalists have just arrived from Naples; one even hurried from Rome. They asked me to say what I think of Tolstoy's "flight"—"flight" is the word they use. I would not talk to them. You, of course, understand that inwardly I am terribly disturbed: I do not want to see Tolstoy a saint; let him remain a sinner close to the heart of the all-sinful world, even close to the heart of each one of us. Pushkin and he—there is nothing more sublime or dearer to us.

LEO TOLSTOY IS DEAD.

A telegram came containing the commonest of words: "is dead."

It struck me to the heart: I cried with pain and anger, and now, half crazy, I imagine him as I know and saw him; I am tormented by a desire to speak with him. I imagine him in his coffin; he lies like a smooth stone at the bottom of a stream, and in his gray beard, I am sure, is quietly hidden that aloof, mysterious little smile. And at last his hands are folded peacefully; they have finished their hard task.

I remember his keen eyes—they saw everything through and through—and the movements of his fingers, as though they were perpetually modeling something out of the air, his talk, his jokes, his favorite peasant words, his elusive voice. And I see what a vast amount of life was embodied in the man, how inhumanly clever he was, how terrifying.

I once saw him as, perhaps, no one has ever seen him. I was walking over to him at Gaspra along the coast, and behind Yussupor's estate, on the shore among the stones I saw his smallish angular figure in a gray, crumpled, ragged suit and crumpled hat. He was sitting with his head on his hands, the wind blowing the silvery hairs of his beard through his fingers: he was looking into the distance out to sea, and the little greenish waves rolled up obediently to his feet and fondled them as if they were telling something about themselves to the old magician. It was a day of sun and cloud, and the shadows of the clouds glided over the stones, and with the stones the old man grew now bright and now dark. The boulders were large, riven by cracks and covered with smelly seaweed; there had been a high tide. He, too, seemed to me like an old stone come to life, who knows all the beginnings and the ends of things, who considers when and what will be the end of the stone, of the grasses of the earth, of the waters of the sea, and of the whole universe from the pebble to the sun. And the sea is part of his soul, and everything around him comes from him, out of him. In the musing motionlessness of the old man I felt something fateful, magical, something which went down into the darkness beneath him and stretched up like a searchlight into the blue emptiness above the earth; as though it were he, his concentrated will, which was drawing the waves to him and repelling them, which was ruling the movements of cloud and shadow, which was stirring the stones to life. Suddenly, in a moment of madness, I felt, "It is possible, he will get up, wave his hand, and the sea will become solid and glassy, the stones will begin to move and cry out, everything around him will come to life, acquire a voice, and speak in their different voices of themselves, of him, against him." I cannot express in words what I felt rather than thought at that moment; in my soul there was joy and fear, and then everything blended in one happy thought: "I am not an orphan on the earth, so long as this man lives on it."

Then I walked on tiptoe away, in order that the pebbles might not scrunch under my feet, not wishing to distract his thoughts. And now I feel I am an orphan, I cry as I write—never before have I cried so inconsolably and in such bitter despair. I do not know whether I loved him; but does it matter, love of him or hatred? He always roused in me sensations and agitations which were enormous, fantastic; even the unpleasant and hostile feelings which he roused were of a kind not to oppress but rather to explode the soul; they made it more sensitive and capacious. He was grand when, with his boots scraping over the ground, as though he were imperiously smoothing its unevenness, he suddenly appeared from somewhere, from behind a door or out of some corner, and came toward you with the short, light, quick step of a man accustomed to walk a great deal on the earth. With his thumbs in his belt he would stop for a second, looking round quickly with a comprehensive glance, a glance which at once took in anything new and instantly absorbed the meaning of everything.

"How do you do?"

I always translated these words into: "How do you do?

There's pleasure for me, and for you there's not much sense in it; but still, how do you do?"

He would come out looking rather small, and immediately everyone round him would become smaller than he. A peasant's beard, rough but extraordinary hands, simple clothes; all this external, comfortable democratism deceived many people, and I often saw how Russians who judge people by their clothes—an old slavish habit—began to pour out a stream of their odious "frankness," which is more properly called "the familiarity of the pig-sty."

"Ah, you are one of us! That's what you are. At last, by God's grace, I am face to face with the greatest son of our native land. Hail forever! I now bow to you."

That is a sample of Muscovite Russian, simple and hearty, and here is another but "free-thinkerish": "Leo Nikolaevich, though I disagree with your religious-philosophical views, I deeply respect in your person the greatest of artists."

And suddenly, under his peasant's beard, under his democratic crumpled blouse, there would rise the old Russian barin, the grand aristocrat; then the noses of the simple-hearted visitors, educated and all the rest, instantly became blue with intolerable cold. It was pleasant to see this creature of the purest blood, to watch the noble grace of his gestures, the proud reserve of his speech, to hear the exquisite pointedness of his murderous words. He showed just as much of the barin as was needed for these serfs, and when they called out the barin in Tolstoy, it appeared naturally and easily, and crushed them so that they shriveled up and whined.

One day I was returning from Yasnaya Polyana to Moscow with one of these "simple-hearted" Russians, a Moscow man, and for a long time he could not recover his breath, but kept on smiling woefully and repeating in astonishment: "Well, well, that was a cold bath. He's severe . . . pooh!"

And in the middle of it all, he exclaimed apparently with regret: "And I thought he was really an anarchist. Every one keeps on saying 'anarchist, anarchist,' and I believe it. . . ."

The man was a large, rich manufacturer, with a great belly and a face the color of raw meat; why did he want Tolstoy to be an anarchist? One of the "profound mysteries" of the Russian soul!

When Leo Nikolaevich wished to please, he could do so more easily than a clever and beautiful woman. Imagine a company of people of all kinds sitting in his room; the Grand Duke Nikolai Mikhailovich, the house-painter Ilya, a social-democrat from Yalta, the stundist Patzuk, a musician, a German, the manager of the estates of Countess Kleinmichel, the poet Bulgakov; and all look at him with the same enamored eyes. He explains to them the teaching of Lao-Tse, and he seems to me an extraordinary man-orchestra, possessing the faculty of playing several instruments at the same time, a brass trumpet, a drum, harmonium, and flute. I used to look at him just as the others did. And now I long to see him once more—and I shall never see him again.

Journalists have come asserting that a telegram has been received in Rome "denying the rumor of Tolstoy's death." They bustled and chattered, redundantly expressing their sympathy with Russia. The Russian newspapers leave no room for doubt.

To lie to him, even out of pity, was impossible; even when he was seriously ill, one could not pity him. It would be banal to pity a man like him. They ought to be taken care of, cherished, not loaded with the wordy dust of worn-out, soulless words.

He used to ask: "You don't like me?" and one had to answer: "No, I don't."

"You don't love me?"—"No, today I don't love you."

In his questions he was merciless, in his answers reserved, as becomes a wise man.

He used to speak with amazing beauty of the past, and particularly of Turgenev; of Fet always with a good-natured smile and always something amusing; of Nekrassov coldly and skeptically; but of all writers exactly as if they were his children and he, the father, knew all their faults, and—there you are!

He would point out their faults before their merits, and every time he blamed someone it seemed to me that he was giving alms to his listeners because of their poverty; to listen to him then made one feel awkward; one's eyes fell before his sharp little smile and—nothing remained in one's memory.

Once he argued fiercely that G. Y. Uspensky wrote in the Tula dialect, and had no talent at all. And later I heard him say to Anton Pavlovich Chekhov: "He [Uspensky] is a writer! In the power of his sincerity he recalls Dostoievsky, only Dostoievsky went in for politics and coquetted while Uspensky is more simple and sincere. If he had believed in God, he would have been a sectarian."

"But you said he was a Tula writer and had no talent."

He drew his shaggy brows down over his eyes and said,

"He wrote badly. What kind of language does he use? There are more punctuation marks than words. Talent is love. One who loves is talented. Look at lovers, they are all talented."

Of Dostoievsky he spoke reluctantly, constrainedly, evading or repressing something: "He ought to have made himself acquainted with the teaching of Confucius or the Buddhists; that would have calmed him down. The main point to realize is that he was a man of rebellious flesh; when angry bumps would suddenly rise on his bald head, and his ears would move. He felt a great deal, but he thought poorly; it is from the Fourierists, from Butashevich and the others, that he learnt to think, and afterward all his life long he hated them. There was something Jewish in his blood. He was suspicious without reason, ambitious, heavy, and unfortunate. It is curious that he is so much read. I can't understand why. It is all painful and useless, because all those Idiots, Adolescents, Raskolnikovs, and the rest of them, they are not real; it is all much simpler, more understandable. It's a pity people don't read Lieskov, he's a real writer—have you read him?"

"Yes, I like him very much, especially his language."

"He knew the language marvelously, even the tricks. Strange that you should like him; somehow you are not Russian, your thoughts are not Russian—is it all right, you're not hurt at my saying that? I am an old man, and, perhaps, I can no longer understand modern literature, but it seems to me that it is all not Russian. They begin to write a curious kind of verse; I don't know what these poems are or what they mean. One has to learn to write poetry from Pushkin, Tiutchev, Fet. Now you"—he turned to Chekhov —"you are Russian. Yes, very, very Russian."

And smiling affectionately, he put his hand on Chekhov's shoulder; and the latter became uncomfortable and began in a low voice to mutter something about his bungalow and the Tartars.

He loved Chekhov and when he looked at him his eyes were tender and seemed almost to stroke Anton Pavlovich's face. Once, when Anton Pavlovich was walking on the lawn with Alexandra Lvovna, Tolstoy, who at the time was still ill and was sitting in a chair on the terrace, seemed to stretch toward them, saying in a whisper: "Ah, what a beautiful, magnificent man; modest and quiet like a girl. And he walks like a girl. He's simply wonderful."

One evening, in the twilight, half closing his eyes and moving his brows, he read a variant of the scene in Father Sergius where the woman goes to seduce the hermit: he read it through to the end, and then, raising his head and shutting his eyes, said distinctly: "The old man wrote it well, well."

It came out with such amazing simplicity, his pleasure in its beauty was so sincere, that I shall never forget the delight which it gave me at the time, a delight which I could not, did not know how to express, but which I could suppress only by a tremendous effort. My heart stopped beating for a moment, and then everything around me seemed to become fresh and revivified.

One must have heard him speak in order to understand the extraordinary, indefinable beauty of his speech; it was, in a sense, incorrect, abounding in repetitions of the same word, saturated with village simplicity. The effect of his words did not come only from the intonation and the expression of his face, but from the play and light in his eyes, the most eloquent eyes I have ever seen. In his two eyes Leo Nikolaevich possessed a thousand eyes.

Once Suler, Sergei Lvovich, Chekhov, and someone else were sitting in the park and talking about women: he listened in silence for a long time and then suddenly said: "And I will tell the truth about women, when I have one foot in the grave. I shall tell it, jump into my coffin, pull the lid over me, and say, 'Do what you like now.' " The look he gave us was so wild, so terrifying that we all fell silent for a while.

He had in him, I think, the inquisitive, mischievous wildness of a Vaska Buslaiev and also something of the stubbornness of soul of a Protopop Avvakum, while above or at his side lay hidden the skepticism of a Tchaadayer. The Avvakumian element harried and tormented with its preachings the artist in him; the Novgorod wildness upset the Shakespeare and Dante in him, while the Tchaadayerian element scoffed at his soul's amusements and, by the way, at its agonies. And the old Russian man in him dealt a blow at science and the state, the Russian driven to the passivity of anarchism by the barrenness of all his efforts to build up a more human life.

Strange! This Buslaiev characteristic in Tolstoy was perceived through some mysterious intuition of Olaf Gulbranson, the caricaturist of "Simplicissimus": look closely at his drawing, and you will see how startlingly he has got the likeness of the real Tolstoy, what intellectual daring there is in that face with its veiled and hidden eyes, for which nothing is sacred and which believe "neither in a sneeze, nor a dream, nor the cawing of a bird."

The old magician stands before me, alien to all, a solitary traveler through all the deserts of thought in search of an all-embracing truth which he has not found—I look at him and, although I feel sorrow for the loss, I feel pride at having seen the man, and that pride alleviates my pain and grief.

It was curious to see Leo Nikolaevich among "Tolstoyans"; there stands a noble belfry and its bell sounds untiringly over the whole world, while round about run tiny, timorous dogs whining at the bell and distrustfully looking askance at one another as though to say, "Who howled best?" I always thought that these people infected the Yasnaya Polyana house, as well as the great house of Countess Panin, with a spirit of hypocrisy, cowardice, mercenary and self-seeking pettiness and legacy-hunting. The "Tolstoyans" have something in common with those friars who wander in all the dark corners of Russia, carrying with them dogs' bones and passing them off as relics, selling "Egyptian darkness" and the "little tears of Our Lady." One of these apostles, I remember, at Yasnaya Polyana refused to eat eggs so as not to wrong the hens; but at Tula railway station he greedily devoured meat, saying: "The old fellow does exaggerate." Nearly all of them like to moan and kiss one another; they all have boneless perspiring hands and lying eyes. At the same time they are practical fellows and manage their earthly affairs cleverly.

Leo Nikolaevich, of course, well understood the value of the "Tolstoyans," and so did Sulerzhizky, whom Tolstoy loved tenderly and whom he always spoke of with a kind of youthful ardor and fervor. Once one of these "Tolstoyans" at Yasnaya Polyana explained eloquently how happy his life had become and how pure his soul, after he accepted Tolstoy's teaching. Leo Nikolaevich leant over and said to me in a low voice: "He's lying all the time, the rogue, but he does it to please me. . . ."

Many tried to please him, but I did not observe that they did it well or with any skill. He rarely spoke to me on his usual subjects of universal forgiveness, loving one's neighbor, the Gospels, and Buddhism, evidently because he realized at once that all that would not go down with me. I greatly appreciated this.

When he liked, he could be extraordinarily charming, sensitive, and tactful; his talk was fascinatingly simple and elegant, but sometimes it was painfully unpleasant to listen to him. I always disliked what he said about women—it was unspeakably vulgar, and there was in his words something artificial, insincere, and at the same time very personal. It seemed as if he had once been hurt, and could neither forget nor forgive. The evening when I first got to know him, he took me into his study—it was at Khamovnik in Moscow—and, making me sit opposite to him, began to talk about Varienka Oliessova and of Twenty-Six Men and a Girl. I was overwhelmed by his tone and lost my head, he spoke so plainly and brutally, arguing that in a healthy girl chastity is not natural. "If a girl who has turned fifteen is healthy, she desires to be touched and embraced. Her mind is still afraid of the unknown and of what she does not understand; that is what they call chastity and purity. But her flesh is already aware that the incomprehensible is right, lawful, and, in spite of the mind, it demands fulfillment of the law. Now you describe Varienka Oliessova as healthy, but her feelings are anemic—that is not true to life."

Then he began to speak about the girl in Twenty-Six Men and a Girl, using a stream of indecent words with a simplicity which seemed to me cynical, and even offended me. Later I came to see that he used unmentionable words only because he found them more precise and pointed; but at the time it was unpleasant to me to listen to him. I made no reply, and suddenly he became attentive and kindly and began asking me about my life, what I was studying, and what I read.

"I am told that you are very well read; is that true? Is Korelenko a musician?"

"I believe not; but I'm not sure."

"You don't know? Do you like his stories?"

"I do, very much."

"It is by contrast. He is lyrical and you haven't got that. Have you read Weltmann?"

"Yes."

"Isn't he a good writer, clear, exact, and with no exaggeration? He is sometimes better than Gogol. He knew Balzac. And Gogol imitated Marlinsky."

When I said that Gogol was probably influenced by Hoffmann, Sterne, and perhaps Dickens, he glanced at me and asked: "Have you read that somewhere? No? It isn't true. Gogol hardly knew Dickens. But you must clearly have read a great deal; now look here, it's dangerous. Kolzov ruined himself by it."

When he accompanied me to the door, he embraced and kissed me and said: "You are real mouzhik. You will find it difficult to live among writers, but never mind, don't be afraid, always say what you feel even if it be rude; it doesn't matter. Sensible people will understand."

I had two impressions from this first meeting: I was glad and proud to have seen Tolstoy, but his conversation reminded me a little of an examination, and in a sense I did not see in him the author of Cossacks, Kholstomier, War and Peace, but a barin who, making allowances for me, considered it necessary to speak to me in the common language, the language of the street and marketplace. That upset my idea of him, an idea which was deeply rooted and had become dear to me.

It was at Yasnaya Polyana that I saw him again. It was an overcast, autumn day with a drizzle of rain, and he put on a heavy overcoat and high leather boots and took me for a walk in the birch wood. He jumped the ditches and pools like a boy, shook the raindrops off the branches, and gave me a superb account of how Fet had explained Schopenhauer to him in this wood. He stroked the damp, satin trunks of the birches lovingly with his hand and said: "Lately I read a poem,

> The mushrooms are gone, but in the hollows
> Is the heavy smell of mushroom dampness . . .

Very good, very true."

Suddenly a hare got up under our feet. Leo Nikolaevich started up, excited, his face lit up, and he whooped like a real old sportsman. Then, looking at me with a curious little smile, he broke into a sensible, human laugh. He was wonderfully charming at that moment.

Another time he was looking at a hawk in the park; it was hovering over the cattle-shed, making wide circles suspended in the air, moving its wings very slightly as if undecided whether or not the moment to strike had come. Leo Nikolaevich stood up, shading his eyes with his hand, and murmured with excitement: "The rogue is going for our chickens. Now, now . . . it's coming. . . . O, he's afraid. The groom is there, isn't he? I'll call the groom. . . ."

And he shouted to the groom. When he shouted, the hawk was scared, swept upward, swung away, and disappeared. Leo Nikolaevich sighed, apparently reproaching himself, and said: "I should not have shouted; he would have struck all the same. . . ."

Once, in telling him about Tiflis, I mentioned the name of V. V. Flerovsky-Bervi. "Did you know him?" Leo Nikolaevich asked with interest. "Tell me, what is he like?"

I told him about Flerovsky; tall, long-bearded, thin, with very large eyes; how he used to wear a long sailcloth blouse, and how, armed with a bundle of rice, cooked in red wine, tied in his belt, and an enormous linen umbrella, he wandered with me on the mountain paths of Trans-Caucasia; how once on a narrow path we met a buffalo and prudently retreated, threatening the brute with the open umbrella, and, every time we stepped back, were in danger of falling over the precipice. Suddenly I noticed that there were tears in Tolstoy's eyes, and this confused me and I stopped.

"Never mind," he said, "go on, go on. It's pleasure at hearing about a good man. I imagined him just like that, unique. Of all the radicals he is the most mature and clever; in his 'Alphabet' he proves conclusively that all our civilization is barbarian, that culture is the work of the peaceful and weak nations, not the strong ones, and that the struggle for existence is a lying invention by which it is sought to justify evil. You, of course, don't agree with this? But Daudet agrees, you know: you remember his Paul Astier?"

"But how would you reconcile Flerovsky's theory, say, with the part played by the Normans in the history of Europe?"

"The Normans? That's another thing."

If he did not want to answer, he would always say, "That's another thing."

It always seemed to me—and I do not think I was mistaken—that Leo Nikolaevich was not very fond of talking about literature, but was vitally interested in the personality of an author. The questions: "Do you know him? What is he like? Where was he born?" I often heard in his mouth. And nearly all his opinions would throw some curious light upon a man.

Of V. K. he said thoughtfully: "He is not a Great-Russian, and so he must see our life better and more truly than we do." Of Anton Chekhov, whom he loved dearly: "His medicine gets in his way; if he were not a doctor, he would be a still better writer." Of one of the younger writers: "He pretends to be an Englishman, and in that character a Moscow man has the least success." To me he once said: "You are an inventor: all these Kuvaldas of yours are inventions." When I answered that Kuvalda had been drawn from life, he said: "Tell me, where did you see him?"

He laughed heartily at the scene in the court of the Kazan magistrate, Konovalov, where I had first seen the man whom I described under the name of Kuvalda. "Blue blood," he said, wiping the tears from his eyes, "that's it—blue blood. But how splendid, how amusing. You tell it better than you write it. Yes you are an inventor, a romantic, you must confess."

I said that all writers are to some extent inventors, describing people as they would like to see them in life. I also said that I liked active people who desire to resist the evil of life by every means, even by violence.

"And violence is the chief evil," he exclaimed, taking me by the arm. "How will you get out of that contradiction, inventor? Now your My Traveling Companion isn't invented—it's good just because it isn't invented. But when you think, you beget knights, all Amadises. . . ."

I remarked that as long as we live in the narrow sphere of our anthropomorphous and unavoidable "traveling companions," we build everything on quicksands and in a hostile medium.

He smiled and nudged me slightly with his elbow: "From that, very, very dangerous conclusions can be drawn. You are a questionable socialist. You are a romantic, and romantics must be monarchists; they always have been."

"And Hugo?"

"Hugo? That's another thing. I don't like him, a noisy man."

He often asked me what I was reading, and always reproached me if I had chosen, in his opinion, a bad book. "Gibbon is worse than Kostomarov. One ought to read Mommsen; he's very tedious, but it's all so solid."

When he heard that the first book I ever read was The Brothers Semganno, he even got angry: "Now, you see—a stupid novel. That's what has spoilt you. The French have three writers, Stendhal, Balzac, Flaubert; and, well, perhaps Maupassant, though Chekhov is better than he. The Goncourts are mere clowns, they only pretend to be serious. They had studied life from books, written by inventors like themselves, and they thought it a serious business; but it was of no use to a soul."

I disagreed with this opinion, and it irritated Leo Nikolaevich a little; he could barely stand contradiction, and sometimes his opinions were strange and capricious.

"There is no such thing as degeneration," he said once. "The Italian Lombroso invented it, and after him comes the Jew Nordau, screaming like a parrot. Italy is the land of charlatans and adventurers; only Aretinos, Casanovas, Cagliostros, and the like are born there."

"And Garibaldi?"

"That's politics; that's another thing."

To a whole series of facts, taken from the life of the merchant-class families in Russia, he answered: "But it's untrue; it's only written in clever books."

I told him the actual history of three generations of a merchant family, which I had known, a history in which the law of degeneration had acted with particular mercilessness. Then he began excitedly tugging at my arm and encouraging me to write about it: "Now that's true. I know it: there are two families like that in Tula. It ought to be written. A long novel, written concisely, do you see? You must do it." His eyes flashed.

"But then there will be knights, Leo Nikolaevich."

"Don't. This is really serious. The one who is going to be a monk and pray for the whole family—it's wonderful. That's real; you sin, and I will go and expiate your sin by prayer. And the other, the weary one, the money-loving founder of the family—that's true too. And he's a drunken, profligate beast, and loves everyone, and suddenly commits murder—ah, it's good. It should be written; among thieves and beggars you must not look for heroes, you really mustn't. Heroes—that's a lie and invention; there are simply people, people, and nothing else."

He often pointed out exaggerations in my stories, which I admitted but once. Speaking of Dead Souls, he said, smiling good-naturedly: "We are all of us terrible inventors. I myself, when I write, suddenly feel pity for some character, and then I give him some good quality or take a good quality away from someone else, so that in comparison with the others he may not appear too black." And then in the stern tones of an inexorable judge: "That's why I say that art is a lie, an arbitrary sham, harmful for people. One writes not what real life is, but what one thinks of life oneself. What good is that to anyone, how I see that tower or sea or Tartar—what interest or use is there in it?"

Once I was walking with him on the lower road from Dulbet to Ai-Todor; he was walking with the light step of a young man, when he said to me more nervously than was usual with him: "The flesh should be the obedient dog of the spirit, running to do its bidding; but we—how do we live? The flesh rages and riots, and the spirit follows it helpless and miserable."

He rubbed his chest hard over the heart, raised his eyebrows, and then, remembering something, went on: "One autumn in Moscow in an alley near the Sukhariot Gate I once saw a drunken woman lying in the gutter. A stream of filthy water flowed from the yard of the house right under her neck and back. She lay in that cold liquid, muttering, shivering, wriggling her body in the wet, but she could not get up."

He shuddered, half closed his eyes, shook his head, and went on gently: "Let's sit down here. . . . It's the most horrible and disgusting thing, a drunken woman. I wanted to help her get up, but I couldn't; I felt such a loathing; she was so slippery and slimy I felt that if I'd touched her, I could not have washed my hands clean for a month—horrible! And on the curb sat a bright, gray-eyed boy, the tears running down his cheeks: he was sobbing and repeating wearily and helplessly: 'Mu-um . . . mu-um-my . . . do get up.' She would move her arms, grunt, lift her head, and again—back went her neck into the filth."

He was silent, and then, looking around, he repeated almost in a whisper: "Yes, yes, horrible! You've seen many drunken women? Many—my God! You must not write about that, you mustn't."

"Why?"

He looked straight into my eyes and, smiling, repeated: "Why?" Then thoughtfully and slowly he said: "I don't know: It just slipped out . . . it's a shame to write about filth. But yet why not write about it? Yes, it's necessary to write all about everything, everything."

Tears came into his eyes. He wiped them away, and smiling he looked at his handkerchief, while the tears again ran down his wrinkles. "I am crying," he said. "I am an old man. It cuts me to the heart when I remember something horrible."

And, very gently touching me with his elbow, he said: "You too—you will have lived your life and everything will remain exactly as it was, and then you too will cry worse than I, more 'streamingly,' as the peasant women say. And everything must be written about, everything; otherwise that bright little boy might be hurt, he might reproach us—'It's untrue, it's not the whole truth,' he will say. He's strict for the truth."

Suddenly he gave himself a shake and said in a kind voice: "Now, tell me a story; you tell them well. Something about a child, about your childhood. It's not easy to believe that you were once a child. You are a strange creature, exactly as if you were born grown up. In your ideas there is a good deal of the childlike and the immature, but you know more than enough of life—and one can not ask for more. Well, tell me a story. . . ."

He lay down comfortably upon the bare roots of a pine tree and watched the ants moving busily among the gray spines.

In the South, which, with its self-asserting luxuriance and flaunting, unbridled vegetation, seems so strangely incongruous to a man from the North, he, Leo Tolstoy—even his name speaks of his inner power—seemed a small man, but knitted and knotted out of very strong roots deep in the earth; in the flaunting scenery of the Crimea, I say, he was at once both out of place and in his place. He seemed a very ancient man, master of all his surroundings; a master-builder who after centuries of absence has arrived in the mansion built by him. He has forgotten a great deal which it contains; much is new to him: everything is as it should be, and yet not entirely so, and he has at once to find out what is amiss and why it is amiss.

He walked the roads and paths with the business-like, quick step of the skilled explorer of the earth; and with sharp eyes, from which neither a single pebble nor a single thought could hide itself, he looked, measured, tested, compared. And he scattered about him the living seeds of indomitable thoughts. He said to Suler once: "You, Liovushka, read nothing, which is not good, out of self-conceit; while Gorky reads a lot, which is not good, because he distrusts himself. I write much, which is not good, because of an old man's ambition, a desire that all should think as I do. Of course, I think it is good, and Gorky thinks it is not good, and you think nothing at all; you simply blink and watch what you may clutch. One day you will clutch something which does not belong to you—it has happened to you before. You will put your claws into it, hold on for a bit, and when it begins to get loose, you won't try to stop it. Chekhov has a superb story The Darling—you are rather like her."

"In what?" asked Suler, laughing.

"You can love well, but to choose—no, you can't, and you will waste yourself on trifles."

"Is everyone like that?"

"Everyone?" Leo Nikolaevich repeated. "No, not everyone."

And suddenly he asked me, exactly as if he were dealing me a blow: "Why don't you believe in God?"

"I have no faith, Leo Nikolaevich."

"It is not true. By nature you are a believer and you cannot get on without God. You will realize it one day. Your disbelief comes from obstinacy, because you have been hurt: the world is not what you would like it to be. There are also some people who do not believe, out of shyness; it happens with young people; they adore some woman, but don't want to show it for fear that she won't understand, and also from lack of courage. Faith, like love, requires courage and daring. One has to say to oneself, 'I believe'—and everything will come right, everything will appear as you want it, it will explain itself to you and attract you. Now, you love much, and faith is only a greater love; you must love still more and then your love will turn to faith. When one loves a woman, she is unfailingly the best woman on earth, and each loves the best woman; and that is faith. A non-believer can not love: today he falls in love with one woman, and next year with another. The souls of such men are tramps living barren lives—that is not good. But you were born a believer and it is no use thwarting yourself. Well, you may say, beauty—and what is beauty? The highest and most perfect is God."

He hardly ever spoke to me on this subject, and its seriousness and the suddenness of it rather overwhelmed me. I was silent.

He was sitting on the couch with his legs drawn up under him, and, breaking into a triumphant little smile and shaking his finger at me, he said: "You won't get out of this by silence, no."

And I, who do not believe in God, looked at him for some reason very cautiously and a little timidly. I looked and I thought: "This man is godlike."

Tolstoy in Gorky's Diary

One hot day he overtook me on the low road. He was riding in the direction of Livadia, mounted on a quiet little Tartar horse. Gray and shaggy, in a light, white, mushroom-shaped felt hat, he looked very much like a gnome.

Holding back his horse he hailed me, and I walked along by his side, telling him, among other things, that I had just had a letter from V. G. Korolenko. Tolstoy shook his beard angrily.

"Does he believe in God?" he asked.

"I do not know."

"That means you do not know the chief thing about him. He is a believer, but he is afraid to admit it in front of atheists."

He spoke in a grumbling and peevish voice, peering angrily at me through half-closed eyelids. It was clear that he was in no mood to talk to me, but when I showed an inclination to go he stopped me.

"Where are you off to?" he inquired. "I am not going too fast, am I?"

And he began to grumble again: "Your Andreyev is also afraid of atheists, but he, too, believes in God—and God keeps him in awe of Him."

When we came to the edge of the estate belonging to the Grand Duke A. M. Romanov, we met three Romanovs who were standing talking on the road, very close to each other. One was the master of Ai-Todor, another was George, and the third, I think, was Piotr Nikolaevich from Dulbet—all of them strong, masterful men. The road was blocked by a one-horse vehicle, and a saddled horse was standing a little to one side. Leo Nikolaevich [Tolstoy] could not pass between them. He stared sternly and expectantly at the Romanovs, but they had turned aside before he came up. At length the saddled horse pranced nervously and stepped aside, allowing Tolstoy's horse to pass.

After riding on in silence for some minutes he exclaimed: "They recognized me, the fools." And added, a few moments later: "That horse knew that it must make way for Tolstoy!"

"Take care of yourself first—and you will have plenty of care left for other people."

"What do we mean when we say we 'know'? I know, of course, that I am Tolstoy, the writer, that I have a wife and children, gray hair, an ugly face and a beard—all that is written down in my passport. But of the soul the passport says not a word, and of the soul I know this: that it wants to be near to God.

"But what is God? God is that of which my soul is an atom. That is all. He who has learnt to meditate finds it hard to believe; yet it is only through faith that one can live in God. So Tertullian wrote: 'Thought is evil.' "

In spite of the monotony of his preaching, what infinite variety is to be found in this almost legendary man! In the park, today, when he was talking with the Mullah of Haspre, he behaved like a trusting, simple-minded little peasant, for whom the time has arrived when he must take thought for his last days. Small of stature and shriveled up, he appeared, beside the broad, corpulent Tartar, like a little old man whose soul had just awakened to the sense of something that lay buried within it, and who feared the questions which that awakening might bring.

He lifted his shaggy eyebrows in amazement, blinking shyly with his piercing little eyes, and extinguishing the intolerably penetrating fire which burnt within them. His all-seeing eye was riveted upon the broad face of the Mullah, the pupil losing that sharpness which so confused people.

To the Mullah he put childish questions on the meaning of life, on the soul, and on God, substituting the verses of the Bible and the Prophets for the verses of the Koran with incredible agility. Altogether he was acting with the marvelous skill of which only a man who is at once a great artist and a great sage is capable.

Again, a few days ago, when he was talking about music to Taneijeff and Suler, he went into raptures over it like a child. One could see that he was admiring his own enthusiasm, or, to be more precise, his capacity for enthusiasm. He held that Schopenhauer had written more wisely and profoundly about music than anyone else; told us, in parenthesis, a comic anecdote about Fet, and described music as "the dumb prayer of the soul."

"Why dumb?" asked Suler.

"Because it uses no words. There is more soul in a sound than there is in a thought. A thought is like a purse—it contains pennies, mere trifles, while a sound remains unsoiled—pure through and through."

With evident delight and in charming, simple words, he expressed his ideas, choosing—this was unusual with him—the finest and the most tender he could think of. And unexpectedly smiling into his beard, he murmured softly, caressingly: "All musicians are stupid people, and the more gifted the musician, the more shallow he is. It is curious that they should all be so pious. . . ."

To Chekhov, at the telephone, he once said: "It is such a good day for me today; my soul is so full of gladness that I want you too to be joyful. You particularly. You are a very fine man, a very fine man."

When you speak to Tolstoy of things which he can put to no use, he listens with indifference and incredulity. In fact he does not ask—he merely inquires. Like a collector of valuable curios, he only collects things which are in keeping with the rest of his collection.

One day he was sorting his letters: "They all make a great fuss about me," he said, "writing and so on. But in the end, when I die, in a year or so, people will say: 'Tolstoy? Ah, that is the count who tried to make boots; and then something curious happened to him. Is that the fellow you mean?' "

Several times I noticed on his face, in his look, the cunning and contented smile of a man who unexpectedly discovers something which he has hidden away. He hides it and then forgets about it. Where can it be? He spends long days of secret anguish pondering incessantly: "Where, oh, where did I put that thing that I want so much?" He is terrified lest the people round him should notice his anguish, should get to know of his loss and worry him about it or injure him in any way. Then he suddenly remembers and finds it. Delighted at his success and no longer afraid to show his feelings to others, he watches those about him with a cunning glance, as much as to say: "You can't hurt me now!"

But as to what he has found and where he found it—that remains a secret.

One never tires of speculating about him, but it is trying to meet him often. Personally I should find it impossible to live in the same house with him, not to mention in the same room. His surroundings become like a desert where everything is scorched by the sun and the sun itself is smoldering away, threatening a black and eternal night.

Morning *

The best thing in the world is to watch the day being born!

As soon as the first ray of the sun strikes the sky, the darkness of the night runs to hide in mountain caves and rock fissures. It hides in the thick leaves of the trees, in the lacework of grass sprinkled with dew while the mountain-tops smile benignly, as if they were saying to the soft shades of night: "Don't be afraid—this is the sun!"

The waves of the sea raise their white manes up high, bow to the sun like polite ladies at court before their king, bow and sing: "Welcome, lord of the world."

The good sun laughs. Those waves have been playing about all night, whirling and dancing, and now they look a sight. They are all disheveled, their green clothes all creased and their velvet bows all tangled.

"Good morning!" says the sun as it rises over the sea. "Good morning, my beauties! But that's enough—you must be quiet now! The children will not be able to bathe if you

* In November 1910, after the death of Leo Tolstoy, a boy of seven named Ilyusha Frenkel wrote Gorky a letter in which he alluded to Tolstoy's death and asked for a story. Gorky answered the lad's letter with a short sketch of Tolstoy and enclosed the story Morning. The typewritten copy of this story, dated 1910, with the author's corrections, was found among his correspondence after his death. Translated by S. D. Kogan.

continue to leap about so wildly! We must arrange life so that it will be good for everyone on earth, mustn't we?"

Green lizards dart out from fissures in the rocks and say to one another, their eyes blinking: "It will be nice and hot today!"

On hot days, flies are lazy and lizards can catch them more easily and eat them. And a nice fly is so good to eat! Lizards have a sweet tooth for flies.

Weighed down by dew, the flowers shake their heads playfully as if to say: "Pray sir, you must write about us, about how fine we look wearing the morning dew! You should make little portraits of us in words. Just try—it is easy—we are so simple. . . ."

They are sly ones, they are! They know very well that their beauty cannot be told in words. They are really only teasing me!

I take my hat off respectfully, and say to them: "It is really very kind of you! Thanks for the honor, only you see, I have no time today. Some other day, perhaps. . . ."

They smile proudly, stretching in the sun. Its rays flicker in the drops of dew, scattering the radiance of diamonds over petals and leaves.

Golden bees and wasps are already circling over them, thirstily drinking their sweet honey. In the busy hum one can hear the song:

Praised be the sun—
Joyous source of life.
Praised be labor—
For the beauty of Earth.

Robin redbreast now wakes up. He stands shaking on his thin legs and also sings a song of quiet joy. Birds know better than humans how nice it is to be alive on Earth. And the robin is always the first bird to greet the sun. In faraway, cold Russia the robin is called the dawn-bird because the feathers on his breast have the color of dawn. Jolly siskins jump about in the bushes. In their grays and yellows, they look like street urchins—and they are just as mischievous and just as noisy.

Hunting for midges, swallows and martins dart about like black arrows, sounding joyous and happy. It is nice to have good light wings and be able to fly fast.

The stems of the peonies tremble. Peonies are great big cups filled with yellow sunshine that looks like golden wine.

People wake up—those whose whole existence means labor, who spend all of their lives beautifying, enriching the earth but themselves remain poor from the day they are born till the day they die.

Why?

You will find that out when you grow up—if you want to know, of course. For the present, learn to love the sun, the source of all joy and power. Be good and jolly just as the sun is good to all alike.

People awake. And now they go to their fields, their work. The good sun smiles down at them. It knows better than anyone how much good these people did to the Earth. It saw the Earth when it was wilderness, and sees it now covered with the works of these people—the works of our fathers and grandfathers and their fathers and grandfathers who, among all the serious things that children do not yet understand, also made all the playthings and all other pleasant things on earth—even the movies.

Oh, they labored much, our fathers did. There is good reason to love and respect the great works they have left all about us!

This is something to think about, children. The story about how people have worked upon the earth is the most interesting story in the world. . . .

Roses bloom in the hedges, and everywhere flowers are smiling. Many of them are already fading—but all look lovingly up to the sky, to the golden sun. Their velvety petals rustle and send out sweet odors. In the warm, blue air, full of fragrance, a sweet song softly rises:

> What is beautiful—remains so
> Even when it fades;
> What we love—we keep on loving,
> Even when we die. . . .

Day has come.

Good day, children. May there be many, many good days in your lives!

I have made this story a little dull.

It is too bad. But when a child gets to be older than forty he becomes a little dull.

Anton Chekhov

"You live badly, my friends. It is shameful to live like that."

Reminiscences of Anton Chekhov *

Once he invited me to the village Koutchouk-Koy where he had a tiny strip of land and a white two-storied house. There, while showing me his "estate," he began to speak with animation: "If I had plenty of money, I should build a sanatorium here for invalid village teachers. You know, I would put up a large, bright building—very bright, with large windows and lofty rooms. I would have a fine library, different musical instruments, bees, a vegetable garden, an orchard. . . . There would be lectures on agriculture, mythology. . . . Teachers ought to know everything, everything, my dear fellow."

He was suddenly silent, coughed, looked at me out of the corners of his eyes, and smiled that tender, charming smile of his which attracted one so irresistibly to him and made one listen so attentively to his words.

"Does it bore you to listen to my fantasies? I do love to talk of it. . . . If you knew how badly the Russian village needs a nice, sensible, educated teacher! We ought in Russia to give the teacher particularly good conditions, and it ought to be done as quickly as possible. We ought to realize that without a wide education of the people, Russia will collapse, like a house built of badly baked bricks. A teacher must be an artist, in love with his calling; but with us he is a journeyman, ill educated, who goes to the village to teach children as though he were going into exile. He is starved, crushed, terrorized by the fear of losing his daily bread. But he ought to be the first man in the village; the peasants ought to recognize him as a power, worthy of attention and respect; no one should dare to shout at him or humiliate him personally, as with us everyone does—the village constable, the rich shopkeeper, the priest, the rural police commissioner, the school guardian, the councilor, and that official who has the title of school inspector, but who cares nothing for the improvement of education and only sees that the circulars of his chiefs are carried out. . . . It is ridiculous to pay in farthings the man who has to educate the people. It is intolerable that he should walk in rags, shiver with cold in damp and draughty schools, catch cold, and about the age of thirty get laryngitis, rheumatism, or tuberculosis. We ought to be ashamed of it. Our teacher, for eight or nine months in the year, lives like a hermit; he has no one to speak a word to; without company, books, or amusements, he is growing stupid, and, if he invites his colleagues to visit him, then he becomes politically suspect—a stupid word with which crafty men frighten fools. All this is disgusting; it is the mockery of a man who is doing a great and tremendously important work. . . . Do you know, whenever I see a teacher, I feel ashamed for him, for his timidity, and because he is badly dressed . . . it seems to me that for the teacher's wretchedness I am myself to blame—I mean it."

He was silent, thinking; and then, waving his hand, he said gently: "This Russia of ours is such an absurd, clumsy country."

A shadow of sadness crossed his beautiful eyes; little rays of wrinkles surrounded them and made them look still more meditative. Then, looking round, he said jestingly: "You see, I have fired off at you a complete leading article from a radical paper. Come, I'll give you tea to reward your patience."

That was characteristic of him, to speak so earnestly, with such warmth and sincerity, and then suddenly to laugh at himself and his speech. In that sad and gentle smile one felt the subtle skepticism of the man who knows the value of words and dreams; and there also flashed in the smile a lovable modesty and delicate sensitiveness. . . .

We walked back slowly in silence to the house. It was a clear, hot day; the waves sparkled under the bright rays of the sun; down below one heard a dog barking joyfully. Chekhov took my arm, coughed, and said slowly: "It is shameful and sad, but true: there are many men who envy the dogs."

And he added immediately with a laugh: "Today I can only make feeble speeches. . . . It means that I'm getting old."

I often heard him say: "You know, a teacher has just come here—he's ill, married. . . . Couldn't you do something for him? I have made arrangements for him for the time being." Or again: "Listen, Gorky, there is a teacher here who would like to meet you. He can't go out, he's ill. Won't you come and see him? Do." Or: "Look here, the women teachers want books to be sent to them."

Sometimes I would find that "teacher" at his house; usually he would be sitting on the edge of his chair, blushing at the consciousness of his own awkwardness, in the sweat of his brow picking and choosing his words, trying to speak smoothly and "educatedly"; or, with the ease of manner of a person who is morbidly shy, he would concentrate himself upon the effort not to appear stupid in the eyes of an author, and he would simply belabor Anton Chekhov with a hail of questions which had never entered his head until that moment.

Anton Chekhov would listen attentively to the dreary, incoherent speech; now and again a smile came into his sad eyes, a little wrinkle appeared on his forehead, and then, in his soft, lusterless voice, he began to speak simple, clear, homely words, words which somehow or other immediately made his questioner simple: the teacher stopped trying to be clever, and therefore immediately became more clever and interesting. . . .

I remember one teacher, a tall, thin man with a yellow, hungry face and a long, hooked nose which dropped gloomily towards his chin. He sat opposite Anton Chekhov and, looking fixedly into Chekhov's face with his black eyes, said in a melancholy bass voice: "From such impressions of existence within the space of the tutorial session there comes a psychical conglomeration which crushes every possibility of an objective attitude towards the surrounding universe. Of course, the universe is nothing but our presentation of it. . . ."

And he rushed headlong into philosophy, and he moved over its surface like a drunkard skating on ice.

"Tell me," Chekhov put in quietly and kindly, "who is that teacher in your district who beats the children?"

The teacher sprang from his chair and waved his arms indignantly: "Whom do you mean? Me? Never! Beating?"

He snorted with indignation.

"Don't get excited," Anton Chekhov went on, smiling reassuringly; "I'm not speaking of you. But I remember—I read it in the newspapers—there is some one in your district who beats the children."

The teacher sat down, wiped his perspiring face, and, with a sigh of relief, said in his deep bass: "It's true . . . there was such a case. . . . It was Makarov. You know, it's not surprising. It's cruel, but explicable. He's married . . . has four children . . . his wife is ill . . . himself consumptive . . . his salary is twenty roubles, the school like a cellar, and the teacher has but a single room—under such circumstances you will give a thrashing to an angel of God for no fault . . . and the children—they're far from angels, believe me."

And the man, who had just been mercilessly belaboring Chekhov with his store of clever words, suddenly, ominously wagging his hooked nose, began to speak simple, weighty, clear-cut words, which illuminated, like a fire, the terrible, accursed truth about the life of the Russian village.

When he said good-by to his host, the teacher took Chekhov's small, dry hand with its thin fingers in both his own, and, shaking it, said: "I came to you as though I were going to the authorities, in fear and trembling. . . . I puffed myself out like a turkey-cock. . . . I wanted to show you that I was no ordinary mortal. . . . And now I'm leaving you as a nice, close friend, who understands everything. . . . It's a great thing—to understand everything! Thank you! I'm taking away with me a pleasant thought: big men are simpler and more understandable . . . and nearer to soul to us fellow men than all those wretches among whom we live . . . Good-by, I will never forget you."

His nose quivered, his lips twisted into a good-natured smile, and he added suddenly: "To tell the truth, scoundrels too are unhappy—the devil take them."

When he went out, Chekhov followed him with a glance, smiled, and said: "He's a nice fellow. . . . He won't be a teacher long."

"Why?"

"They will run him down—whip him off."

He thought for a bit, and added quietly, "In Russia an honest man is rather like the chimney-sweep with whom nurses frighten children."

I think that in Anton Chekhov's presence everyone involuntarily felt in himself a desire to be simpler, more truthful, more one's self. I often saw how people cast off the motley finery of bookish phrases, smart words, and all the other cheap tricks with which a Russian, wishing to figure as a European, adorns himself, like a savage with shells and fish's teeth. Anton Chekhov disliked fish's teeth and cock's feathers, anything "brilliant" or foreign, assumed by a man to make himself look bigger, disturbed him. I noticed that, whenever he saw any one dressed up in this way, he had a desire to free him from all that oppressive, useless tinsel and to find underneath the genuine face and living soul of the person. All his life Chekhov lived on his own soul, he was always himself, inwardly free, and he never troubled about what some people expected and others—coarser people—demanded of Anton Chekhov. He did not like conversations about deep questions, conversations with which our dear Russians so assiduously comfort themselves, forgetting that it is ridiculous, and not at all amusing, to argue about velvet costumes in the future when in the present one has not even a decent pair of trousers.

Beautifully simple himself, he loved everything simple, genuine, sincere, and he had a peculiar way of making other people simple.

Once, I remember, three luxuriously dressed ladies came to see him; they filled his room with the rustle of silk skirts and the smell of strong scent; they sat down politely opposite their host, pretended that they were interested in politics, and began "putting questions": "Anton Pavlovich, what do you think? How will the war end?"

Anton Pavlovich coughed, thought for a while, and then gently, in a serious and kindly voice, replied: "Probably in peace."

"Well, yes . . . certainly. But who will win? The Greeks or the Turks?"

"It seems to me that those will win who are the stronger."

"And who, do you think, are the stronger?" the ladies asked together.

"Those who are the better fed and the better educated."

"Ah, how clever," one of them exclaimed.

"And whom do you like best?" another asked.

Anton Pavlovich looked at her kindly, and answered with a meek smile: "I love candied fruits . . . don't you?"

"Very much," the lady exclaimed gaily.

"Especially Abrikossov's," the second agreed solidly. And the third, half closing her eyes, added with relish: "It smells so good."

And all three began to talk with vivacity, revealing, on the subject of candied fruit, great erudition and subtle knowledge. It was obvious that they were happy at not having to strain their minds and pretend to be seriously interested in Turks and Greeks, to whom up to that moment they had not given a thought.

When they left, they merrily promised Anton Pavlovich: "We will send you some candied fruit."

"You managed that nicely," I observed when they had gone.

Anton Pavlovich laughed quietly and said: "Everyone should speak his own language."

On another occasion I found at his house a young and prettyish crown prosecutor. He was standing in front of Chekhov, shaking his curly head, and speaking briskly: "In your story, The Conspirator, you, Anton Pavlovich, put before me a very complex case. If I admit in Denis Grigoriev a criminal and conscious intention, then I must, without any reservation, bundle him into prison, in the interests of the community. But he is a savage; he did not realize the criminality of his act. . . . I feel pity for him. But suppose I regard him as a man who acted without understanding, and suppose I yield to my feeling of pity, how can I guarantee the community that Denis will not again unscrew the nut in the sleepers and wreck a train? That's the question. What's to be done?"

He stopped, threw himself back, and fixed an inquiring look on Anton Pavlovich's face. His uniform was quite new, and the buttons shone as self-confidently and dully on his chest as did the little eyes in the pretty, clean, little face of the youthful enthusiast for justice.

"If I were judge," said Anton Pavlovich gravely, "I would acquit Denis."

"On what grounds?"

"I would say to him: You, Denis, have not yet ripened into the type of the deliberate criminal; go—and ripen."

The lawyer began to laugh, but instantly again became pompously serious and said: "No, sir, the question put by you must be answered only in the interests of the community whose life and property I am called upon to protect. Denis is a savage, but he is also a criminal—that is the truth."

"Do you like gramophones?" suddenly asked Anton Pavlovich in his soft voice.

"O yes, very much. An amazing invention!" the youth answered gaily.

"And I can't stand gramophones," Anton Pavlovich confessed sadly.

"Why?"

"They speak and sing without feeling. Everything seems like a caricature . . . dead. Do you like photography?"

It appeared that the lawyer was a passionate lover of photography; he began at once to speak of it with enthusiasm, completely uninterested, as Chekhov had subtly and truly noticed, in the gramophone, despite his admiration for that "amazing invention." And again I observed how there looked out of that uniform a living and rather amusing little man, whose feelings toward life were still those of a puppy hunting.

When Anton Pavlovich had seen him out, he said sternly: "They are like pimples on the seat of justice—disposing of the fate of people."

And after a short silence: "Crown prosecutors must be very fond of fishing . . . especially for little fish."

He had the art of revealing everywhere and driving away banality, an art which is possible only to a man who demands much from life and which comes from a keen desire to see men simple, beautiful, harmonious. Banality always found in him a discerning and merciless judge.

Someone told in his presence how the editor of a popular magazine, who was always talking of the necessity of love and pity, had, for no reason at all, insulted a railway guard, and how he usually acted with extreme rudeness toward his inferiors.

"Well," said Anton Pavlovich with a gloomy smile, "but isn't he an aristocrat, an educated gentleman? He studied at the seminary. His father wore bast shoes, and he wears patent-leather boots."

And in his tone there was something which at once made the "aristocrat" trivial and ridiculous.

"He's a very gifted man," he said of a certain journalist. "He always writes so nobly, humanely, . . . lemonadely. Calls his wife a fool in public . . . the servants' rooms are damp and the maids constantly get rheumatics."

"Don't you like N. N., Anton Pavlovich?"

"Yes, I do—very much. He's a pleasant fellow," Anton Pavlovich agrees, coughing. "He knows everything . . . reads a lot . . . he hasn't returned three of my books . . . he's absent-minded. Today he will tell you that you're a wonderful fellow, and tomorrow he will tell somebody else that you cheat your servants, and that you have stolen from your mistress's husband his silk socks . . . the black ones with the blue stripes."

Some one in his presence complained of the heaviness and tediousness of the "serious" sections in thick monthly magazines.

"But you mustn't read those articles," said Anton Pavlovich. "They are friends' literature—written for friends. They are written by Messrs. Red, Black, and White. One writes an article; the other replies to it; and the third reconciles the contradictions of the other two. It is like playing whist with a dummy. Yet none of them asks himself what good it is to the reader."

Once a plump, healthy, handsome, well-dressed lady came to him and began to speak à la Chekhov: "Life is so boring, Anton Pavlovich. Everything is so gray: people, the sea, even the flowers seem to me gray. . . . And I have no desires . . . my soul is in pain . . . it is like a disease."

"It is a disease," said Anton Pavlovich with conviction, "it is a disease; in Latin it is called morbus imitatis."

Fortunately the lady did not seem to know Latin, or, perhaps, she pretended not to know it.

"Critics are like horse-flies which prevent the horse from plowing," he said, smiling his wise smile. "The horse works, all its muscles drawn tight like the strings on a doublebass, and a fly settles on his flanks and tickles and buzzes. . . . He has to twitch his skin and swish his tail. And what does the fly buzz about? It scarcely knows itself; simply because it is restless and wants to proclaim: 'Look, I too am living on the earth. See, I can buzz, too, buzz about anything.' For twenty-five years I have read criticisms of my stories, and I don't remember a single remark of any value or one word of valuable advice. Only once Skabichevsky wrote something which made an impression on me . . . he said I would die in a ditch, drunk."

Nearly always there was an ironical smile in his gray eyes, but at times they became cold, sharp, hard; at such times a harder tone sounded in his soft, sincere voice, and then it appeared that this modest, gentle man, when he found it necessary, could rouse himself vigorously against a hostile force and would not yield.

But sometimes, I thought, there was in his attitude toward people a feeling of hopelessness, almost of cold, resigned despair.

"A Russian is a strange creature," he said once. "He is like a sieve; nothing remains in him. In his youth he fills himself greedily with anything which he comes across, and after thirty years nothing remains but a kind of gray rubbish. . . . In order to live well and humanly one must work—work with love and with faith. But we, we can't do it. An architect, having built a couple of decent buildings, sits down to play cards, plays all his life, or else is to be found somewhere behind the scenes of some theater. A doctor, if he has a practice, ceases to be interested in science, and reads nothing but The Medical Journal, and at forty seriously believes that all diseases have their origin in catarrh. I have never met a single civil servant who had any idea of the meaning of his work: usually he sits in the metropolis or the chief town of the province, and writes papers and sends them off to Zmiev or Smorgon for attention. But that those papers will deprive some one in Zmiev or Smorgon of freedom of movement—of that the civil servant thinks as little as an atheist of the tortures of hell. A lawyer who has made a name by a successful defense ceases to care about justice, and defends only the rights of property, gambles on the Turf, eats oysters, figures as a connoisseur of all the arts. An actor, having taken two or three parts tolerably, no longer troubles to learn his parts, puts on a silk hat, and thinks himself a genius. Russia is a land of insatiable and lazy people: they eat enormously of nice things, drink, like to sleep in the daytime, and snore in their sleep. They marry in order to get their house looked after and keep mistresses in order to be thought well of in society. Their psychology is that of a dog: when they are beaten, they whine shrilly and run into their kennels; when petted, they lie on their backs with their paws in the air and wag their tails."

Pain and cold contempt sounded in these words. But, though contemptuous, he felt pity, and, if in his presence you abused anyone, Anton Pavlovich would immediately defend him. "Why do you say that? He is an old man . . . he's seventy." Or: "But he's still so young . . . it's only stupidity."

And, when he spoke like that, I never saw a sign of aversion in his face.

When a man is young, banality seems only amusing and unimportant, but little by little it possesses a man; it permeates his brain and blood like poison or asphyxiating fumes; he becomes like an old, rusty signboard: something is painted on it, but what? You can't make out.

Anton Pavlovich in his early stories was already able to reveal in the dim sea of banality its tragic humor; one has only to read his "humorous" stories with attention to see what a lot of cruel and disgusting things, behind the humorous words and situations, had been observed by the author with sorrow and were concealed by him.

He was ingenuously shy, he would not say aloud and openly to people: "Now do be more decent", he hoped in vain that they would themselves see how necessary it was that they should be more decent. He hated everything banal and foul, and he described the abominations of life in the noble language of a poet, with the humorist's gentle smile, and behind the beautiful form of his stories people scarcely noticed the inner meaning, full of bitter reproach.

The dear public, when it reads his Daughter of Albion, laughs and hardly realizes how abominable is the well-fed squire's mockery of a person who is lonely and strange to every one and everything. In each of his humorous stories I hear the quiet, deep sigh of a pure and human heart, the hopeless sigh of sympathy for men who do not know how to respect human dignity, who submit without any resistance to mere force, live like fish, believe in nothing but the necessity of swallowing every day as much thick soup as possible, and feel nothing but fear that someone, strong and insolent, will give them a hiding.

No one understood as clearly and finely as Anton Chekhov the tragedy of life's trivialities, no one before him showed men with such merciless truth the terrible and shameful picture of their life in the dim chaos of bourgeois everyday existence.

His enemy was banality; he fought it all his life long, he ridiculed it, drawing it with a pointed and unimpassioned pen, finding the mustiness of banality even where at the first glance everything seemed to be arranged very nicely, comfortably, and even brilliantly—and banality revenged itself upon him by a nasty prank, for it saw that his corpse, the corpse of a poet, was put into a railway truck "For the Conveyance of Oysters."

That dirty green railway truck seems to me precisely the great, triumphant laugh of banality over its tired enemy; and all the "Recollections" in the gutter press are hypocritical sorrow, behind which I feel the cold and smelly breath of banality, secretly rejoicing over the death of its enemy.

Reading Anton Chekhov's stories, one feels oneself in a melancholy day of late autumn, when the air is transparent and the outline of naked trees, narrow houses, grayish people, is sharp. Everything is strange, lonely, motionless, helpless. The horizon, blue and empty, melts into the pale sky and its breath is terribly cold upon the earth which is covered with frozen mud. The author's mind, like the autumn sun, shows up in hard outline the monotonous roads, the crooked streets, the little squalid houses in which tiny, miserable people are stifled by boredom and laziness and fill the houses with an unintelligible, drowsy bustle. Here anxiously, like a gray mouse, scurries "the Darling," the dear, meek woman who loves so slavishly and who can love so much. You can slap her cheek and she won't even dare to utter a sigh aloud, the meek slave. . . . And by her side is Olga of The Three Sisters: she too loves much, and submits with resignation to the caprices of the dissolute, banal wife of her good-for-nothing brother; the life of her sisters crumples before her eyes, she weeps and cannot help anyone in anything, and she has not within her a single live, strong word of protest against banality.

And here is the lachrymose Ranevskaya and the other owners of The Cherry Orchard, egotistical like children, with the flabbiness of senility. They missed the right moment for dying; they whine, seeing nothing of what is going on around them, understanding nothing, parasites without the power of again taking root in life. The wretched little student, Trofimov, speaks eloquently of the necessity of working—and does nothing but amuse himself, out of sheer boredom, with stupid mockery of Varya, who works ceaselessly for the good of the idlers.

Vershinin dreams of how pleasant life will be in three hundred years, and lives without perceiving that everything around him is falling into ruin before his eyes; Solyony, from boredom and stupidity, is ready to kill the pitiable Baron Tousenbach.

There passes before one a long file of men and women, slaves of their love, of their stupidity and idleness, of their greed for the good things of life; there walk the slaves of the dark fear of life; they straggle anxiously along, filling life with incoherent words about the future, feeling that in the present there is no place for them.

At moments out of the gray mass of them one hears the sound of a shot: Ivanov or Triepliev has guessed what he ought to do, and has died.

Many of them have nice dreams of how pleasant life will be in two hundred years, but it occurs to none of them to ask themselves who will make life pleasant if we only dream.

In front of that dreary, gray crowd of helpless people there passed a great, wise, and observant man; he looked at all these dreary inhabitants of his country, and, with a sad smile, with a tone of gentle but deep reproach, with anguish in his face and in his heart, in a beautiful and sincere voice, he said to them: "You live badly, my friends. It is shameful to live like that."

The Gorky-Chekhov Correspondence

Gorky to Chekhov

Second half of November, 1898
Nizhni-Novgorod

Esteemed Anton Pavlovich,

I thank you most heartily for your response to my letter and for the promise to write to me again. I am eagerly awaiting the letter from you and would very much like to hear your opinion of my stories. Saw Uncle Vanya the other day, saw it—and wept like a woman, although I am by no means high-strung. Came home dazed and soul-scarred by your play, wrote you a long letter and tore it up. One cannot express fully and coherently the effect your play has on the soul, although I felt, as I watched its heroes, as though someone were sawing at me with a blunt-edged saw. Its jagged teeth grated right over the heart and the heart shrank under it, groaned and writhed. For me Uncle Vanya is a terrible play; it is a completely new form of dramatic art, a hammer with which you strike at the empty skulls of the public. At any rate the stupidity of the latter is impregnable and they do not understand you properly either in Seagull or in Uncle Vanya. Will you write more dramas? How amazingly you do them!

In the last act of Vanya, when, after a long pause, the doctor speaks of the heat in Africa, I quivered with delight at your talent and trembled with fear for people, for our colorless, niggardly life. How splendidly you strike here at the soul, and how well-aimed! Yours is a colossal talent. But tell me, what do you expect to achieve by such blows? Will men awaken under their impact? Pitiful creatures we are, truly, "boresome" people. Sullen despicable creatures, and one must be a fanatic of virtue to love and pity such wretched sacks of bones as we are and help us to live. And yet one cannot but harbor compassion for people just the same. I am far from virtuous and yet I wept aloud at the sight of Vanya and his ilk, although it is very foolish to weep and even more foolish to mention it. You know, it seems to me that in this play you are colder than the devil in your attitude to people. You are as indifferent to them as the snow or the hurricane. Forgive me, I may be mistaken; at any rate I speak only of my own personal impression. You see, your play made me feel at once terrified and sad. I experienced the same emotions once before in my childhood: there was a corner of our garden where with my own hands I had planted flowers and they grew very nicely there. But one day I came to water them and behold, the bush had been torn up by the roots, the flowers destroyed, and on their crushed stalks lay our pig—a sick pig whose hind legs had been crushed in the gate. It was a fine, clear day and the accursed sun shone down with particular zeal and indifference upon the devastation and the ruins of my heart.

So there you are. Do not take offense if I have said anything amiss. I am an absurd and crude creature and my soul is incurably sick. Incidentally, this is a proper state for the soul of a thinking man.

I press your hand warmly and wish you good health and zest for work. However highly you are praised, you are not valued sufficiently, and, I feel, poorly understood. I personally should not wish to serve as a proof of the latter.

Yours, A. Peshkov

Let me know, please, how you feel about Vanya yourself. And if I bore you with all this—say so frankly. Otherwise I may perhaps write to you again.

Chekhov to Gorky

Yalta, December 3, 1898

Esteemed Alexei Maximovich,

Your last letter afforded me great pleasure. I thank you with all my heart. Uncle Vanya was written a long, long time ago. I had never seen it on the stage. Of recent years it has been produced frequently by the provincial theaters—perhaps because I have published a volume of my plays. On the whole I am cool toward my plays, have long since drifted away from the theater and no longer wish to write for it.

You ask my opinion of your stories. My opinion—there is undoubted talent and moreover a genuine and great talent. In The Steppes, for example, it is expressed with unusual force and I even felt a twinge of envy that I had not written it myself. You are an artist, and a clever man. You feel magnificently, you are plastic, i.e., when you describe something you see it and feel it with your hands. This is real art. There you have my opinion and I am very glad to be able to express it to you. I repeat, I am very glad, and were we to make each other's acquaintance and have a talk for an hour or two you would see for yourself how highly I esteem you and what faith I have in your gifts.

Shall we talk about defects now? But this is not so simple. To speak of defects in talent is equivalent to speaking of the defects of a huge tree growing in the garden; here, after all, it is not a simple matter of the tree itself but the taste of the person looking at the tree. Is it not so?

I shall begin by saying that in my opinion you lack restraint. You are like a spectator in a theater who expresses his delight so unrestrainedly that he prevents both himself and others from hearing. This lack of restraint is felt especially in the descriptions of nature which interrupt your dialogues; when one reads these descriptions one wishes they were more compact, briefer, say two or three lines. The frequent repetitions of luxuriousness, rustling, velvety, etc., lend these descriptions a certain rhetorical flavor, a monotony which palls on the reader and wearies him. Lack of restraint is felt also in your descriptions of women (Malva, On the Raft) and in the love scenes. This is not broad sweep of expression, it is merely lack of restraint. Then there is the frequent use of words that are out of place in stories such as yours. Accompaniment, disk, harmony—such words intrude. You speak a great deal about waves. In the descriptions of intellectuals one feels a tension, a certain cautiousness; this is not because you have observed intellectuals insufficiently. You know them, but you do not know exactly from what angle to approach them.

How old are you? I do not know you, do not know who you are and where you come from, but I feel that while you are still young you ought to leave Nizhni and live two or three years, to rub shoulders, so to speak, with literature and literary people; not in order to learn from the strutting roosters and to become more brilliant, but to plunge head first into literature and to love it; in addition to which the provinces make one prematurely old.

I hasten to post this. Be well and successful. I press your hand warmly. Once again thank you for your letter.

Yours,

A. Chekhov

. . . The day before yesterday I was at L. N. Tolstoy's; he praised you very highly and said that you were "a remarkable writer." He likes your The Fair and On the Steppe, and does not like Malva. He said: "You can invent anything you like, but you can't invent psychology, and in Gorky one comes across just psychological inventions; he describes what he has never felt." So much for you! I said that when you were next in Moscow we would go together to see him.

When will you be in Moscow? On Thursday there will be a private performance—for me—of The Sea Gull. If you come to Moscow I will give you a seat. . . .

From Petersburg I get painful letters, as it were from the damned, and it's painful to me as I don't know what to answer, how to behave. Yes, life when it is not a psychological invention is a difficult business. . . .

Tolstoy has long been asking about you; you arouse his curiosity. He is evidently touched.

I read the play and sent it to Yoost.* Thank you for bothering with me. It was very good of you.

A bold Swede! Never have I seen such a striking portrayal of lickspittle aristocracy. I see certain defects in the technical side of the play; I regard Julie's and the lackey's talks about their families as superfluous—but that's trivial. The gist of the play amazed me and the author's strength aroused my envy and surprise, dissatisfaction with myself, and lots of gloomy thoughts about our literature.

I'm surprised at you! What do you see in common between me and Strindberg? That Swede is a direct descendant of those Normans who throughout the course of history were everywhere the creators of something strong, beautiful, and original. In the awful period of the Crusades they succeeded in creating a real knightly state in Sicily and in the darkness of those times it was the torch of humanity, of spiritual nobility; doubtless the best state there was at the time. Strindberg is the reincarnation of Ragnar Leatherbreeches, who in the good old times so enjoyed saying "mass on spears" to the Scots and Picts. He is a great man with a brave heart and a clear head; he doesn't hide his hatred and doesn't conceal his love and I guess he gives the numbskulls of our days plenty of sleepless nights. He is a man with a great mind. What can there possibly be in common between him and me; I am not trying to belittle myself when I say this; I am speaking with a heavy heart for don't I want to be myself and not have a sealed door in my soul which won't set my bold thoughts free?

* Strindberg's play Froken Julie is under discussion. Chekhov had sent a translation of it by E. M. Shavrovaya-Yoost to Gorky: "I am sending you Strindberg's play Froken Julie. Read it and return it to the owner." (May 9, 1899.)

Somewhere Nietzsche said, "All writers are the lackeys of some morality or other." Strindberg is no lackey. I am a lackey and I serve a mistress whom I don't believe and don't respect. Do I even know her? Perhaps not. So you see what the matter is. It's very sad and depressing as far as I'm concerned, Anton Pavlovich. And since you aren't having a very happy time of it either, I won't discuss my heavy spiritual fetters.

On April 30, they produced Uncle Vanya in Tiflis. A friend wrote me a letter on his impressions. They produced it twice in succession and he attended both performances. I am sorry that I can't forward you his letter but I can tell you that he must have been tremendously affected. I enclose the review in Kavkaz which he sent and which he swore over. In my opinion the reviewer didn't go very deep and he understood things badly, very superficially. All the same, it may be interesting to you.

Read Gedberg in Nachalo, Anton Pavlovich. I am sure that you will enjoy him.

It's too bad that you saw a poor performance of Chaika, although I would even go to see a poor one. Write me how long you will stay in Lopasno and when you will go to the Crimea. I shall tell the priest to go to see you and I'll send you his book. He asked me to come to the Crimea. I am not going. I am not going anywhere. I shall stay in Nizhni all summer. My wife and child are taking the steamboat on the Volga. When my wife returns she'll immediately leave for Kama as far as Perm. I will be living alone and working. "Solitude is the mother of wisdom," one of Gedberg's heroes says, and another adds "and folly." I am for the first. I would like to be completely alone, more alone than you are. A family is all very well but you are even better off without one, so far.

Couldn't the translator be prevailed upon to give Froken Julie to Zhizn? I would very much like to see it published in that magazine.

"It's a consolation that others are no better than we are," says Jan. The disgusting lickspittle! How clearly he revealed his own contemptible soul with these words.

And again I ask myself and you—why don't we have either a Strindberg or a Gedberg or an Ibsen or a Hauptmann?

Why? Is it really true as others say that education and our middle schools throttle individualism, make a man characterless, destroy his soul?

But I weary you with my long letters.

Good-by! My best wishes. I hope you will be in a good mood and want to work.

My hearty handshake.

Why are you so downhearted, my precious Alexei Maximovich? Why do you so furiously abuse your Foma Gordeyev? Here I think, apart from everything else, if you will permit me to say so, are two reasons. You began successfully, began with aplomb, and now everything seems to you commonplace and humdrum, you are irked and dissatisfied. This is in the first place. Secondly, a man of letters cannot live in the provinces with impunity. Whatever you might say, you have tasted literature and you are now poisoned beyond hope. You are a writer and a writer you will remain. It is natural for a writer to keep close to literary spheres, to live cheek by jowl with those who write, to breathe in the literary atmosphere. Do not fight against what is natural, submit once and for all—and move to Petersburg or Moscow. Abuse writers, do not acknowledge them, despise half of them, but live among them.

Should you happen to be in Moscow, drop in to see me on the Dmitrovka.

Be well, I press your hand warmly and wish you all the best. Do not be downcast.

Yours,

First of all, I am against dedications, of whatever it may be, to living people. I used to follow the fashion in dedications, and now feel, if you please, that it ought not be done. That is, as a general thing. In the particular case of the dedication to me of Foma Gordeyev, it gives me great pleasure and honor. Only, how did I merit it? However, it is yours to judge and mine only to thank you and accept. If possible, make the dedication without superfluous words, i.e., write merely, "Dedicated to so-and-so," and it will do. Only Volinsky goes in for long dedications.

Still more of practical advice: print more and not fewer than five or six thousand copies. The book will go quickly. The second edition can be printed together with the first. More advice: when reading the proofs, cross out a host of concrete nouns and other words. You have so many such nouns that the reader's mind finds it a task to concentrate on them, and he soon grows tired. You understand it at once when I say, "The man sat on the grass"; you understand it because it is clear and makes no demands on the attention. On the other hand, it is not easily understood, and it is difficult for the mind, if I write, "A tall, narrow-chested, middle-sized man, with a red beard, sat on the green grass, already trampled by pedestrians, sat silently, shyly, and timidly looked about him." That is not immediately grasped by the mind, whereas good writing should be grasped at once—in a second. One thing more: you are by nature lyrical, the timbre of your soul is gentle. If you were a composer you would shun the writing of marches.

To be rude, noisy, to hurt, to accuse violently—these things are not natural to your talent. So you will understand if I advise you not to be sparing when you read the proofs.

Chekhov to Gorky

Yalta, January 2, 1900

Precious Alexei Maximovich,

I wish you a happy New Year! How are you getting on? How are you feeling? When are you coming to Yalta? Write fully. I have received the photograph, it is very good; many thanks for it.

Thank you, too, for the trouble you have taken in regard to our committee for assisting invalids coming here. Send any money there is or will be to me, or to the executive of the Benevolent Society, no matter which.

My story (i.e., In the Ravine) has already been sent off to Zhizn. Did I tell you that I liked your story An Orphan extremely, and sent it to Moscow to first-rate readers? There is a certain professor Foht in the Medical Faculty in Moscow who reads Slyeptsov capitally. I don't know a better reader. So I have sent your Orphan to him. Did I tell you how much I liked a story in your third volume, My Traveling Companion? There is the same strength in it as in In the Steppe. If I were you, I would take the best things out of your three volumes and republish them in one volume at a rouble—and that would be something really remarkable for vigor and harmony. As it is, everything seems shaken up together in the three volumes; there are no weak things, but it leaves an impression as though the three volumes were not the work of one author but of seven.

Scribble me a line or two.

Nizhni-Novgorod to Yalta

Happy New Year

I am living aimlessly, as always. I feel myself terrifically unstrung. I shall go to Yalta at the end of March or in April if I don't get sick before then. I have a terrific desire to live differently somehow—more brilliantly, faster—that is the main thing—faster. Not long ago I saw Uncle Vanya on the stage. It was remarkably well acted! (I incidentally am no expert on acting and always when I like a play the acting is splendid.) However Uncle has the strength to compel even bad actors to act well. That's a fact. For there are plays which you can't possibly spoil by the acting, and there are plays which are ruined by good acting. Recently I saw the Power of Darkness at the Maly Theater. Formerly I laughed when I saw it and I rather liked it, even; now, however, it arouses my dislike and I'll never go to see it again. All this is the result of the acting of good actors who mercilessly brought out all its crudeness and nonsense. The same applies to music: I go into raptures over Ernst when a bad fiddler plays it but if a virtuoso plays some trashy song it becomes positively foul. I read your Dama. Do you know what you're doing? You're killing realism. And you'll kill it soon for a long time to come. That form has outlived its time. It's a fact! No one after you can go any farther on that path; no one can write so simply about simple things as you can. After reading the most insignificant of your stories everything else seems coarse, written not with a pen but with a fence post. And—that is the main thing—everything else seems lacking in simplicity, unnatural. That's the truth. In Moscow there is a student, Georgy Chulkov—you know, he imitates you most successfully and seems like a talented youngster. So there you go, doing away with realism. And I am extremely glad. So be it! And to hell with it!

The fact is the time has come when the heroic is required. Everyone wants things that are exciting and brilliant so that it won't be like life, you see, but superior to life, better, more beautiful. Present-day literature must definitely begin to color life and as soon as it does this, life itself will acquire color. That is to say people will live faster, more brilliantly. And observe what ugly eyes they have now—dull, cloudy, glassy.

You do splendid work with your short stories by rousing people's disgust for that sleepy, half-dead life—the devil take it! That Dama of yours had such an effect on me that I immediately wanted to change wives, to suffer, to swear, and so forth, in the same spirit. But I didn't change wives—there was none to change with. I merely had a terrific row with my wife and with her sister's husband, my bosom friend. You probably didn't expect such a result? I am not joking—that's exactly what happened. And it doesn't affect me alone that way, don't smile. Your stories are exquisitely cut phials filled with all the smells of life and—believe me! —a sensitive nose can distinguish among them the subtle, pungent, and healthy odor of what is "genuine," really valuable and essential, which is in every one of your phials. Well, enough of that, or you'll think I'm paying you compliments.

As regards a separate volume of my best stories, that was a splendid idea on your part. I shall arrange it although I decidedly do not agree that My Traveling Companion is a good story.

Was that the way to write on that subject? Just the same, kindly enumerate those stories which are worthy of each other. Well—In the Steppes, Izergel, On the Raft, My Traveling Companion, and then what? Chelkash? How about Malva?

You treat me very strangely, that is to say not strangely but somehow surprisingly—I mean absurdly. That is, it isn't you who treat me that way but I who treat you. Your letters produce a peculiar impression upon me. Not at present when I am terrifically unstrung, but in general. I am very fond of them and so forth in the same spirit. Excuse me for all the long-windedness, but you see the fact is that every time I write you I want to tell you something amusing and pleasant and in general make life on this rather disagreeable earth of ours more pleasant, easier. Thanks for the news about Sredin. He too is a hell of a fine fellow. Only I can't for the life of me understand—why does he like Timkovsky? There is a problem! Give Sredin my regards.

And they say that you are getting married to some actress with a foreign name. I don't believe it. But if it's true I'm glad. It's fine to be married provided the woman isn't from the country and isn't radical. But the best thing is children. Oh what a scamp of a son I have. And very smart, you'll see for yourself when I bring him with me in the spring. Only he learned to swear from me and he swears at everybody and I can't make him unlearn. It's most amusing—but not pleasant—when a two-year-old charlatan shouts to his mother at the top of his lungs: "Get out right this minute, you anathema!"

And how distinctly he pronounces the word an-a-the-ma.

Well, good-by. My best regards. Somehow my Foma hasn't yet appeared. Did you read about how the Germans praise you? And recently somebody in Petersburg wrote that Uncle is better than The Sea Gull. That's a complicated business.

Please write me.

Gorky to Chekhov

Nizhni, middle of January, 1900

Well, I have seen Leo Nikolaevich [Tolstoy]. Eight days have passed since then and I cannot yet marshal my impressions. He startled me at first by his appearance. I had imagined him to be quite different: taller and broader-boned. And he seemed a little old man, reminding me somehow of the stories of that brilliant eccentric, Suvorov. But when he began to speak I listened spellbound. All that he said was so astonishingly simple, profound, and although at times perfectly incorrect—in my opinion—nevertheless marvelously good. But the chief thing is his great simplicity.

He is really a whole orchestra, but not all the horns are playing in unison. And this is also very good, for it is so human—that is, so peculiar to man. Essentially—it is terribly stupid to call a man a genius. It is quite impossible to understand what genius is. It is far simpler and clearer to say—Leo Tolstoy: that is both brief and quite original, absolutely like nothing else, and, moreover, somehow powerful, that's it, powerful. To see Leo Nikolaevich is very important and valuable, although I by no means consider him a miracle of nature. One looks at him and it is frightfully pleasant to feel that one is also a man, to realize that man can be such as Leo Tolstoy. You understand me? It is pleasant for humanity in general. He was very nice to me but that, of course, is not important. Neither is what he said about my stories important, but everything taken together is important: everything that was said, his manner of speaking, sitting, and looking at me. It is very harmonious and powerfully beautiful. I could never believe that he was an atheist, although I felt it, but now when I heard him speak about Christ and saw his eyes—too clever for a believer—I know that he is indeed an atheist and a confirmed one. Am I right?

I sat with him for more than three hours, then I went to the theater, arrived at the third act of Uncle Vanya. Again Uncle Vanya. Yes, again. And I will deliberately go to see this play again, buying a ticket in advance. I do not consider it a gem, but I see in it more than others do: it has enormous content, it is symbolic and in form it is quite original and incomparable. It is a pity that Vishnevsky does not understand Vanya, but then the others were magnificent! By the way, Stanislavsky's Astrov is not quite as he should be.

However, all of them play divinely! The Maly Theater is amazingly crude compared to this cast [the Moscow Art Theater]. What clever, intelligent people they all are, how much artistic feeling they have! Knipper is a superb actress, a charming woman and very clever. How fine are her scenes with Sonya! And Sonya, too, plays splendidly.

Everyone, even the servant Grigory, was magnificent, all of them had an excellent and thorough understanding of what they were about and, by god, even Vishnevsky's erroneous interpretation of Uncle Vanya may be forgiven him for the sake of his acting. On the whole, this theater struck me as a solid, serious, and important undertaking. And how fitting the absence of music, and the fact that the curtain moves apart instead of rising. You know, I had never dreamed that such acting and staging could be. Fine! I even regret that I do not live in Moscow—I would be a regular habitué of this marvelous theater. Saw your brother, he was standing and applauding. I never applaud actors—it is offensive for them, i.e., it ought to be.

Well, have you seen Cyrano de Bergerac? I saw it recently and was enchanted with the play.

> Make way for free Gascons, make way!
> 'Twas under the southern skies,
> With sun in our blood that our eyes
> First saw the light of the day.

I love that "sun in our blood." That's how one ought to live—like Cyrano. And not like Uncle Vanya and all the others like him.

However, I tire you. Farewell!

I have pleurisy. I cough with all my might and cannot sleep at night for the pain in my side. I will go to Yalta this spring for the cure, without fail.

I press your hand warmly. My regards to Sredin if you see him and ask him to convey my respects to Yartsev and Alexin.

Yours,
A. Peshkov

Chekhov to Gorky

Yalta, February 3, 1900

Dear Alexei Maximovich,

Thank you for your letter, for the words about Tolstoy and Uncle Vanya (which I have not seen on the stage). Thank you in general for not forgetting me. Here, in this blessed Yalta, one can perish without letters. Inactivity and this stupid waiting, with the temperature permanently above zero, the absolute dearth of interesting women, the swinish snouts on the esplanade—all this can befoul and wear out a man in the shortest time. I am so tired, it seems to me that this winter has dragged on for ten years.

You have pleurisy? Then why do you stay in Nizhni? Why? What is keeping you in Nizhni, may I ask? What tar has you plastered down to that town? If, as you write, you like Moscow, then why not live in Moscow? In Moscow there are theaters, etc., etc., and, most important of all, from Moscow, it is a simple matter to go abroad, but living in Nizhni you will get stuck in Nizhni and will never travel farther than Vasilsursk. You must see more, know more, and broaden your knowledge. You have a strong, tenacious imagination, but it is like a big stove which is not sufficiently fed with fuel. This is felt in general and in your stories in particular: in your stories you give two or three figures, but these figures stand isolated, apart from the mass: it is easy to see that these figures live in your imagination, but they remain figures and the mass is not perceived. I make an exception in the case of your Crimean things (My Traveling Companion, for example) where besides the figures one does feel the human mass from which they emerged, and the air, and the planes beyond, in a word, everything. You see how much I have written and all to dissuade you from sitting in Nizhni. You are a young man, strong and hardy. If I were you I would set out for India, or any other damn place, I would take two more university degrees. I would, I would—you laugh, but it hurts me to feel that I am already forty, that I am shortwinded and have sundry other minor ailments which prevent one from living as one pleases. However, be a good man and comrade; do not be angry with me for lecturing you like a priest in my letters.

Write to me. I am awaiting Foma Gordeyev, which I have not yet read properly.

There is nothing new. Be well. I press your hand warmly.

Yours,

A. Chekhov

Chekhov to Gorky

Yalta, February 15, 1900

Dear Alexei Maximovich,

Your article in the Nizhni-Novgorod Listok was balm to my soul. What a talented person you are! I can't write anything but belles-lettres; you possess the pen of a journalist as well. I thought at first I liked the article so much because you praise me in it; afterward it came out that Sredin and his family and Yartsev were all delighted with it. So peg away at journalism. God bless you!

Why don't they send me Foma Gordeyev? I have read it only in bits, and one ought to read it straight through at a sitting as I have just read Resurrection. Except the relations of Nehludov and Katusha, which are somewhat obscure and made up, everything in the novel made the impression of strength, richness, and breadth, and the insincerity of a man afraid of death and refusing to admit it and clutching at texts and holy Scripture.

Write to them to send me Foma.

Twenty-Six Men and a Girl is a good story. There is a strong feeling of the environment. One smells the hot rolls.

They have just brought your letter. So you don't want to go to India? That's a pity. When India is in the past, a long sea voyage, you have something to think about when you can't get to sleep. And a tour abroad takes very little time, it need not prevent your going about in Russia on foot.

I am bored, not in the sense of Weltschmerz, not in the sense of being weary of existence, but simply bored from want of people, from want of music which I love, and from want of women, of whom there are none in Yalta. I am bored without caviar and pickled cabbage.

I am very sorry that apparently you have given up the idea of coming to Yalta. The Art Theater from Moscow will be here in May. It will give five performances and then remain for rehearsals. So you come, study the stage at the rehearsals, and then in five to eight days write a play, which I should welcome joyfully with my whole heart.

Yes, I have the right now to insist on the fact that I am forty, that I am a man no longer young. I used to be the youngest literary man, but you have appeared on the scene and I became more dignified at once, and no one calls me the youngest now.

Things are going slowly with the play, my dear Anton Pavlovich. For the life of me I cannot understand the need for a third act. This is how I see it: Act 1—the plot is raveled; Act 2—the plot thickens; Act 3—the plot is unraveled. However, I am continuing to write, although I am keeping in mind Shcheglov's advice: begin by writing a five-act tragedy, revise it a year later into a three-act drama, take the same the following year and turn it into a one-act sketch, and the year after burn the sketch, marry a rich wench, and everything will be fine and dandy. Incidentally, this may not have been Shcheglov's advice but someone else's.

I am obsessed by thoughts of China. I should like so much to go to China! It is a long time since I have desired anything so strongly. You also want to travel long distances. Will you go? Really? It would be fine!

It is very nice living here, you know. On holiday mornings I go with a group of mouzhiks to the woods at Psel and spend the whole day with them there. We sing songs, cook porridge, drink a little, and talk of this and that. The mouzhiks here are fine, literate, and possessed of a peculiar dignity; they have not known serfdom and are quite nice in their attitude to the gentry. Simple. On Friday evening we are going fishing and will spend the night in the woods. We will spend Saturday and Sunday in the woods. We shall drink and we shall stroll and if death should come we shall die. Fine! And yet there is something sad about the mouzhiks, the village and the Ukrainian folk songs.

I am being very careful to avoid that aching in my heart and yet it continues to ache. God knows why, I don't.

I read The Ravine to the mouzhiks. You should have seen how splendid it was. The mouzhiks wept and I with them. They liked Kostyl tremendously. So much so, that one mouzhik, Petro Derid, even expressed regret that so little had been written about this Kostyl. Lipa, the old man who says "Great is Mother Russia," was also liked. It was all very nice indeed, I must say. The mouzhiks forgave everything, the old Tsybukhin and Axinia and everyone. You are a wonderful man, Anton Pavlovich, and yours is a tremendous talent.

I bathe every day, play gorodkee,* and have grown very healthy. I wish you the same with all my heart. I press your hand.

Good-by. Let me know about China.

My dear Alexei Maximovich,

Your suggestion about China surprised me. And the play? What about the play? Have you finished it? As a matter of fact it is too late to go to China, for apparently the war is drawing to a close. In any case I could go only as a doctor. A military doctor. If the war continues I will go, but in the meantime I am sitting and writing a little.

There is nothing new here, only the heat and oppressiveness, almost unbearable.

I have just been reading in the papers that you are writing a play. Write, write, write! It is necessary. Even should the play fail, don't let that discourage you. A failure will be soon forgotten, but a success, however slight, may be of vast service to the theater.

Chekhov to Gorky

Yalta, October 16, 1900

Dear Alexei Maximovich,

. . . On the 21st of this month I am going to Moscow, and from there abroad. Can you imagine—I have written a play; but as it will be produced, not now but next season, I have not made a fair copy of it yet. It can lie as it is. It was very difficult to write Three Sisters. Three heroines, you see, each a separate type and all the daughters of a general. The action is laid in a provincial town, as it might be Perm, the surroundings military, artillery.

The weather in Yalta is exquisite and fresh, my health is improving. I don't even want to go away to Moscow. I am working so well, and it is so pleasant to be free from the irritation I suffered from all the summer. I am not coughing, and am even eating meat. I am living alone, quite alone. My mother is in Moscow.

Thanks for your letters, my dear fellow, thanks very much. I read them over twice. My warmest greetings to your wife and Maxim. And so, till we meet in Moscow. I hope you won't play me false, and we shall see each other.

God keep you.

Gorky to Chekhov

Nizhni, end of March, 1901

I had intended to write to you long since, my dear Anton Pavlovich, but, you see, I am in such a mood now that I positively cannot concentrate on anything. Each day passes in tense expectation of something new, every day one hears incredible rumors and reports, one's nerves are strained to the breaking point and every day one sees scores of people just as agitated as oneself.* Yesterday our governor brought some more or less accurate news from Petersburg. Vyazemsky † has been exiled. Legal proceedings against the thirty-three and forty-nine writers who signed the letter condemning the actions of the police on March 4 are about to be instituted on the grounds of incitement to rebellion.

* From 1899 to 1901 student disorders, provoked by the students' discontent with the university regime, arose in university cities of Russia. They increased after the government published the "provisional rules," under which students were punished for demonstrating, by expulsion from the university and obligatory military service, no matter what their health, family position, education, or age. Particularly sharp students' protests arose after the "provisional rules" were employed in the case of Kiev University students, one hundred and eighty-three of whom were sent into the Army for taking part in a meeting. Gorky's letters to writers speak of his absorption in these events. The letter to Chekhov was written by Gorky when he returned from Petersburg at the end of March 1901, and had witnessed a student demonstration, March 4. The results of the demonstration were mass arrests and exile. Soon after (April 17, 1901) Gorky was arrested and kept in prison. He was accused of buying a mimeograph for printing proclamations addressed to the workers, of writing a denial of the official government communique on the March 4 demonstration, and of participation in the student revolutionary movement.

† L. D. Vyazemsky, prince, member of the State Council, who received a sharp reprimand from the Czar for interfering with the actions of the police during the March 4 demonstration.

 After the March 4 demonstration writers met at the Russian Writers Mutual Aid Society and addressed a sharp protest to the Home Affairs Ministry against the violence used against the demonstrators. Another protest against the authorities' action was a letter of Russian writers addressed to Russian newspapers and magazines. It was signed by forty-three writers, Gorky among

There is strong dissatisfaction among the guard troops at the recent orders and particularly the participation of the bodyguard Cossack detachment in the fighting on the fourth.

Legal investigation on the March 4 affair established the exact figures of those beaten up: sixty-two men, thirty-four women; four killed—Stelling, a technologist; Annensky, a doctor; a girl student; and an old woman trampled underfoot by the horses. Fifty-four policemen, gendarmes, and Cossacks injured. And all this took place within a space of not more than thirty-forty minutes! You can imagine the violence of the conflict! I shall never forget that battle as long as I live! Both sides fought savagely, ferociously. Women were seized by the hair and beaten up with nagaikas, one student girl, an acquaintance of mine, was flogged on the back, as though she were a pillow, until she was black and blue, another girl had her skull fractured, a third lost an eye. But with all the gory mugs no one knows yet which side took the upper hand.

Well, good-by, good-by, my dear Anton Pavlovich. God give you health, will to work, and happiness, for it is never too late to be happy. I wish you all the best, you are a good man. And Three Sisters is progressing magnificently. Better than Uncle Vanya. About this I will write later on when I come to myself somewhat.

Yours,
A. Peshkov

Gorky to Chekhov

Christ is Risen!
Dear Anton Pavlovich:

I made my departure from Yalta after some trouble with the chief of police,* and on Saturday at 6:40 P.M. arrived in Moscow. I had lost your Moscow address. I met Korsh in the station but forgot to ask him. All I remember is Dmitrovka. I wandered about Moscow, saw the Kremlin in the morning, went to the Vorobyev Hills and in the evening left for Nizhni.

I was on the same train with Posse and another acquaintance. I couldn't get to sleep all night; I was in a rotten mood. . . . As I left the Nizhni station I saw my wife walking with Posse and Zhukovsky. It made me furious when I learned that we had all been traveling in the same car and hadn't seen each other. I haven't much hopes that this letter will reach you, but all I can say is that I am glad I met you, terribly glad! You were, I believe, the first man I ever met who is free and who does not worship anything. How fine it is that you can regard literature as your primary business in life. I myself, though I feel how fine that is, am incapable of living the way you do—I have too many other likes and dislikes. It angers me but I can't help it.

* Gorky was given permission to remain in Yalta two months for treatment, as is evident from the communication of the Nizhni-Novgorod governor to the Tauride governor dated March 15, 1899, No. 430: "I have the honor to inform Your Excellency that Alexei Maximovich Peshkov, living in Nizhni-Novgorod under special police surveillance, as a result of his application to the Ministry of Home Affairs has been given permission to live in Yalta for 2 months for medical treatment."

I ask you please not to forget me. Speaking frankly—I would like you to point out my shortcomings to me from time to time, give me advice and in general treat me like a comrade who requires teaching.

I wanted to speak about this to you back in Yalta and ask you this favor, but it's harder for me to talk than to write. All the same I hinted at it and perhaps you understood what I meant at the time.

Write a play, Anton Pavlovich. By God, that's what everyone needs. Speaking of plays, in Moscow I stayed overnight with Timkovsky. He is an educated person and seems intelligent. He has a gloomy disposition and loves to philosophize and study philosophy. Watching him and listening to him talk, I was sorry that you didn't read his play through. I'd very much like to hear what you would have to say as regards its "idea." And Posse keeps asking that you contribute something to Zhizn. Speaking frankly I also would like you to. Posse likes you very much and would be proud of your collaboration on the magazine. Did you read the article on you by Solovyov? I don't like the part where he talks about you; but all in all it's a lively article and even a pleasant one. All the same, when will there be real criticism? When all is said and done Solovyov's article supports and strengthens my intention of writing about you, not because I am capable of making a "genuine critique" but because I can treat the subject more profoundly than Solovyov.

And as a preliminary I will write a decent story and dedicate it to you. Do you have any objection to my doing so? Let me know. Good-by! I send you my best wishes. It wouldn't be a bad idea if you left for the Crimea soon; in Moscow you must be having as rotten weather as we are having here.

With a hearty handshake.

Yours,
A. Peshkov

By all means, golubchik, finish the play. You feel that it is not turning out as you should like, but don't trust your feeling, as it may deceive you. One usually dislikes a play while writing it, but afterward it grows on one. Let others judge and make decisions.

Chekhov to Gorky

Moscow, October 22, 1901

Five days have passed since I read your play The Petty Bourgeois. I have not written to you till now because I could not get hold of the fourth act; I have kept waiting for it, and—I still have not got it. And so I have only read three acts, but that I think is enough to judge of the play. It is, as I expected, very good, written à la Gorky, original, very interesting; and, to begin by talking of the defects, I have noticed only one, a defect incorrigible as red hair in a red-haired man—the conservatism of the form. You make new and original people sing new songs to an accompaniment that looks second-hand, you have four acts, the characters deliver edifying discourses, there is a feeling of alarm before long speeches, and so on, and so on. But all that is not important, and it is all, so to speak, drowned in the good points of the play. Pertchihin—how living! His daughter is enchanting, Tatyana and Pyotr are also, and their mother is a splendid old woman. The central figure of the play, Nil, is vigorously drawn and extremely interesting! In fact, the play takes hold of one from the first act. Only God preserve you from letting anyone act Pertchihin except Artyom, while Alexeyev-Stanislavsky must certainly play Nil. Those two figures will do just what's needed; Pyotr—Meierhold. Only Nil's part, a wonderful part, must be made two or three times as long. You ought to end the play with it, to make it the leading part. Only do not contrast him with Pyotr and Tatyana; let him be by himself and them by themselves, all wonderful, splendid people independently of each other. When Nil tries to seem superior to Pyotr and Tatyana, and says to himself that he is a fine fellow, the element so characteristic of our decent working man, the element of modesty, is lost. He boasts, he argues, but you know one can see what sort of man he is without that. Let him be merry, let him play pranks through the whole four acts, let him eat a great deal after his work—and that will be enough for him to conquer the audience with. Pyotr, I repeat, is good. Most likely you don't even suspect how good he is. Tatyana, too, is a finished figure, only (a) she ought really to be a schoolmistress, ought to be teaching children, ought to come home from school, ought to be taken up with her pupils and exercise-books, and (b) it ought to be mentioned in the first or second act that she has attempted to poison herself; then, after that hint, the poisoning in the third act will not seem so startling and will be more in place. Teterev talks too much: such characters ought to be shown bit by bit between others, for in any case such people are everywhere merely incidental—both in life and on the stage. Make Elena dine with all the rest in the first act, let her sit and make jokes, or else there is very little of her, and she is not clear. Her avowal to Pyotr is too abrupt, on the stage it would come out in too high relief. Make her a passionate woman, if not loving at least apt to fall in love. . . .

Chekhov to Gorky

July 9, 1902

I have read your play.* It is new and unmistakably fine. The second act is very good; it is the best, the strongest, and when I was reading it, especially the end, I almost danced with joy. The tone is gloomy, oppressive; the audience unaccustomed to such subjects will walk out of the theater, and you may well say good-by to your reputation as an optimist in any case. My wife will play Vassilisa, the immoral and spiteful woman; Vishnevsky walks about the house and imagines himself the Tartar—he is convinced that is the part for him. Luka, alas! you must not give to Artyom. He will repeat himself in that part and be exhausted; but he would do the policeman wonderfully, it is his part. The part of the actor, in which you have been very successful (it is a magnificent part), should be given to an experienced actor, Stanislavsky perhaps. Katchalev will play the baron.

You have left out of the fourth act all the most interesting characters (except the actor), and you must mind now that there is no ill effect from it. The act may seem boring and unnecessary, especially if, with the exit of the strongest and most interesting actors, there are left only the mediocrities. The death of the actor is awful; it is as though you gave the spectator a sudden box on the ear apropos of nothing without preparing him in any way. How the baron got into the doss-house and why he is a baron is also not sufficiently clear. . . .

Andreyev's Thought is something pretentious, difficult to understand, and apparently no good, but it is worked out with talent. Andreyev has no simplicity, and his talent reminds me of an artificial nightingale. Skitaletz now is a sparrow, but he is a real living sparrow. . . .

Chekhov in Gorky's Diary

For five days now my temperature has been above normal, but the idea of staying in bed is hateful to me.

A fine gray rain is sprinkling the earth with a fine wet dust. I can hear the guns rumbling at Fort Iko—they are being attacked by the enemy. The long tongue of the searchlight licks the clouds at night; it is a disturbing sight, for it does not allow one to forget this devil's invention—war.

I have been reading Chekhov. If he had not died ten years ago the war would certainly have killed him, having first poisoned him with hatred toward mankind. I remembered his funeral.

The coffin of the writer so "dearly loved" by Moscow was brought in a green freight car labeled in huge letters on the side: FOR OYSTERS. A part of the great crowd that had assembled at the station to meet the writer followed the coffin of General Keller, which had been brought from Manchuria at the same time, and was profoundly astonished to find that Chekhov was being buried with full military honors. When the mistake was discovered, certain cheerful spirits began to giggle and crack jokes. Chekhov's coffin was followed by only about a hundred people, not more. I recall particularly two lawyers, both in new shoes and speckled neckties, evidently "fiancés." Walking behind them I could hear one of them, V. A. Maklakoff, discoursing on the sagacity of dogs; the other—a man unknown to me—boasted of the comforts of his country home and the beauty of its surroundings. A lady in a lilac dress, carrying a lace-fringed umbrella, was trying to convince an old gentleman in large spectacles of the merits of the deceased. "Ah! he was wonderfully charming, and so witty . . ." The old gentleman coughed incredulously. The day was a hot and dusty one. At the head of the procession a big, stout policeman rode majestically on a fat white horse. It all seemed cruelly common and vulgar, and quite incompatible with the memory of a great and subtle artist.

In a letter to old A. S. Suvorin, Chekhov wrote: "There is nothing more tiresome and unpoetical, so to speak, than the prosaic struggle for existence which takes all the joy out of life and drives one to apathy."

Those words express an intensely Russian vein of thought, which, to my mind, was not characteristic of A. P. Chekhov. In Russia, where there is such an abundance of everything but where people lack the love of work for itself, the majority thinks in that way. The Russian admires energy, but finds it hard to believe in it. A writer with an active mind like Jack London, for instance, is impossible in Russia. Although his books are very popular there, I do not find that they inspire the Russian with a desire to act; they merely excite his imagination.

But Chekhov is not intensely Russian from that point of view. With him this "struggle for life" began in early youth, with the drudgery, the sordidness of everyday life, the cares and worries necessary to obtain a loaf of bread—and not for himself alone; for a very large loaf of bread was needed in his family. To those joyless cares he had given up all the strength of his youth, and we can only marvel how it was that he managed to retain his sense of humor. He saw life merely as a colorless aspiration for satiety and peace; the great dramas and tragedies of it were hidden for him under a thick layer of everyday matters. And it was only after he had to some extent freed himself from the care of seeing all the mouths round him properly fed that he was able to throw a long-sighted glance at the essence of those dramas.

I have never known a man feel the importance of work as the foundation of all culture, so deeply, and for such varied reasons, as did Chekhov. This feeling expressed itself in all the trifles of his life: in his habits, in his choice of things, and in that noble love for man's works which, knowing no desire of collecting them, never tires of admiring them as the product of man's creative spirit. He loved to build, plant gardens, ornament the earth; he felt the poetry of labor. With what touching care did he watch the growth of the fruit trees and ornamental shrubs which he had planted in his garden. Full of plans for the building of his house in Autka, he used to say: "If every man did all he could on the piece of earth belonging to him, how beautiful would this world be!"

I had started to write a play called Vasska Busslaev,* and one day I read to him Vasska's boastful monologue:

"Ha, were I only endowed with more strength and power
I'd breathe a hot breath—and make the snows melt!

* A hero of the Novgorod epos.

I'd go round the earth and plow it through and through!
I'd walk for years and years and build town after town,
Put up churches without number, and grow gardens without end;
I'd adorn the earth—as though it were a maiden fair;
Clasp it in my arms—as though it were my bride;
Lift it to my heart, and carry it to God:
Just look, my God, at this earth down here,
Look how finely Vasska has adorned it!
You just threw it like a stone into the sky,
While I have made a precious diamond out of it!
Just look, my God, and rejoice with me!
Look how bright it flashes in the sun's rays!
I'd have given it to you, Lord, as a fine gift—
Only—no—it would not do—I am too fond of it myself!"

Chekhov liked this monologue very much, and coughing excitedly he said to me and Dr. A. H. Alexin, who was present: "That's very fine indeed! Very true, and very human! In this lies the essence of all philosophy. Man has made the earth habitable—therefore he must also make it comfortable for himself."

He shook his head in obstinate affirmation and repeated: "He will!"

He asked me to read Vasska's boastful speech over again. I did so and he listened attentively to the end, then he remarked:

"The two last lines are unnecessary—they are impertinent. There is no necessity for that. . . ."

Of his own literary works he spoke very little and very unwillingly; I should like to add with a certain chastity, and with the same caution as he used when speaking of Leo Tolstoy. Very rarely, when in a cheerful mood, he would tell us, laughingly, of a new idea he had had—usually a humorous one.

"You know, I am going to write about a schoolteacher; she will be an atheist, adore Darwin, be convinced of the necessity of fighting with the superstitions and prejudices of the people—but this will not prevent her from boiling a black cat in the bath house at midnight in order to obtain from it a certain bone which is popularly supposed to be a potent love charm."

His plays he described as very "gay" ones, and I think he honestly believed that the plays he wrote were "gay." Probably it was due to his influence that Savva Morozov * used to persist in saying: "Chekhov's plays ought to be staged as lyric comedies."

But in general he followed literature with a serious attention that was particularly touching with regard to "beginners." With marvelous patience he would read carefully through numerous manuscripts by B. Lazarevsky, N. Oligee, and many others.

"We need more writers," he used to say. "Literature is still a novelty in our country, even for the elect. In Norway there is one writer to every 226 men of the whole population, while in Russia there is only one to a million . . ."

His illness at times made him hypochondriacal, almost misanthropic. On such days he was capricious in his judgments and morose in his attitude toward all people. One day, lying on a couch, coughing and playing with a thermometer, he said: "To live in order that we may die is not very pleasant; but to live knowing that we shall die before our time is up is profoundly stupid. . . ."

Another time, sitting at an open window and watching the far-away horizon of the sea, he murmured angrily, all of a sudden: "We have got accustomed to living in hopes of fine weather, good crops, a pleasant love affair, of becoming rich or getting an appointment as chief of police, but I have never come across people who live in the hope of growing more clever. We think 'things will be better under a new Czar, and still better in two hundred years'—but no one troubles himself about improving things tomorrow. Altogether life gets more and more complicated every day and just moves along of its own accord, while people become more and more stupid every day and more and more of them just potter about on the outskirts of life."

He remained deep in thought for some minutes, then, puckering his eyebrows, he added: "Like crippled beggars during a church procession."

He was a doctor—and illness for a doctor is always harder to bear than for a patient; the patient only feels, while the doctor, in addition to feeling, knows the processes by which his organism is being destroyed. In such cases we may consider knowledge as causing the approach of death.

When he laughed his eyes were very fine: tender, caressing, and soft as a woman's. And his laugh, which was an almost silent one, was such an unusual kind of laugh. One could see that he delighted in it, reveled in it; I never met anyone who could laugh in—if I may say so—such a "spiritual" way. Coarse anecdotes never provoked even a smile.

Laughing in his delightful manner one day he said to me.

"Do you know why Tolstoy's attitude toward you is so changeable? He is jealous, he thinks Sulerzhizky likes you better than he does him. Yes, it is so. He said to me yesterday: 'I cannot treat Gorky with sincerity—I do not know why it is so—but I cannot. It is even unpleasant to me to know that Suler lives with him. It is bad for Suler. Gorky is an unkind man. He reminds me of a theological student who has been forced against his will to take the hood and has thereby become embittered toward everybody. He has the soul of a spy, he has come into the land of Canaan, where he feels himself a stranger, watches everything that goes on around him, notices everybody, and reports to a god of his own. And his god is a monster, something like a satyr or a water sprite such as you find in the tales of peasant women."

Chekhov laughed till the tears came while telling me this, and wiping his eyes he continued: "I said to him: 'Gorky is a very kind man!' But he insisted: 'No, no, I know all about him! He has the nose of a duck—only unhappy and unkind men have a nose like that. Women, too, don't love him, and women are like dogs, they can scent a good man. Suler—that's another matter—he possesses the truly precious capacity of loving people disinterestedly. He is a genius in that line! To know how to love—means to know everything.' "

Chekhov paused for a moment and then went on: "Yes, the old man is jealous. . . . What a wonderful old fellow he is! . . ."

He always spoke of Tolstoy with a peculiar, hardly perceptible yet tender and anxious smile in his eyes, lowering his voice as though speaking of something mysterious and fairy-like, that demanded soft, cautious words. He often complained that there was no Eckermann at Tolstoy's side, no one who could write down conscientiously all the sharp, sudden, and often contradictory thoughts of the old wizard.

"You ought to do it," he said to Sulerzhizky. "Tolstoy is so fond of you, he talks to you so well and tells you such a lot. . . ."

Concerning Suler, Chekhov once said to me: "He is a wise child. . . ." Which was very true.

One day Tolstoy was speaking with rapture about some tale of Chekhov's, I think it was Dushenka. "It is like lace," he said, "made by a chaste young girl; there were such lace-makers in olden times; they used to depict all their lives, all their dreams of happiness, in the lace design. They dreamt in designs of all that was dear to them, wove all their pure, uncertain love into their lace."

Tolstoy spoke with great agitation, his eyes full of tears. It happened that that very day Chekhov's temperature had gone up and he was sitting there with a high flush on his cheeks, his head bowed, carefully wiping the glasses of his spectacles. He was silent for a long time, then he sighed deeply and said in a low, bashful voice: "There are many misprints in it. . . ."

A lot could be written about Chekhov, but it would have to be done in a fine and subtle way which I do not possess. It would be well to write about him in the same manner as he himself wrote The Steppe, a tale with a peculiar atmosphere, so light and so pensively sad in a Russian way.

A tale—just for oneself. It does one good to recall the memory of such a man, it brings renewed energy into one's life, a clear definite meaning.

Man is the axle of the world, in spite of his sins and defects. We all hunger for the love of our fellow men, and when one is hungry even an underbaked loaf is sweet.

Leonid Andreyev

"Ah! Where is a pub, the temple of literary worship?"

Reminiscences of Leonid Andreyev *

In the spring of 1898 I read in the Moscow Courier a story called Bergamot and Garaska—an Easter story of the usual type. Written to appeal to the heart of the holiday reader, it reminded him once again that man is still capable, at certain moments and in certain special circumstances, of a feeling of generosity, and that at times enemies become friends, if only for a short while, if only for a day.

I wrote the author a few lines about his story, and I received from L. Andreyev an amusing answer; he wrote merry, unusual phrases in a singular handwriting, with half-printed letters, and amongst them stood out in particular relief a disingenuous but skeptical aphorism:

"To a well-fed man to be generous is as pleasant as to have coffee after dinner."

So began my acquaintance with Leonid Nikolaevich Andreyev. In the summer I read some more of his short stories and light articles under his journalistic pseudonym of James Lynch, and noticed how quickly and boldly the individual talent of the new writer was developing.

In the autumn, on my way to the Crimea, at the Kursk railway station in Moscow, someone introduced us to each other. Dressed in an oldish overcoat, in a shaggy sheepskin hat tilted to one side, he looked like a young actor in an Ukrainian theatrical company. His handsome face struck me as not very mobile, but in the fixed glance of his dark eyes gleamed the smile which so pleasantly irradiated his stories and light articles. I don't remember his words, but they were unusual, and unusual also was the construction of his agitated speech. He spoke hurriedly, with a dullish, booming voice, with a little crisp cough, his words slightly choking him, while he waved his hands monotonously as though he were conducting. He appeared to me a healthy, spritelike, cheery man capable of supporting with a laugh the woes of this world. His excitement was pleasant.

"Let us be friends!" he said, pressing my hand.

I, too, was joyfully excited.

In the winter, on my way from the Crimea to Nizhni, I stopped in Moscow, and there our relations rapidly assumed the character of a close friendship.

Seeing how little he was in touch with reality—how little interested in it, indeed—I was the more surprised by the power of his intuition, by the fertility of his imagination, by the grip of his fantasy. A single phrase, at times a single pointed word was enough to start him off, and seizing the insignificant thing given him he would instantly develop it into a scene, anecdote, character, story.

"Who is S.?" he asked about a certain author fairly popular at that time.

"A tiger out of a fur shop," I replied.

He laughs and, lowering his voice, as though communicating a secret, says hurriedly: "You know, I must describe a man who has convinced himself that he is a hero, a tremendous destroyer of all that exists, and has become frightful to himself even—yes! Everybody believes him—so well has he deceived himself. But somewhere in his own corner, in real life, he is a mere miserable nonentity, is afraid of his wife or even of his cat."

So winding one word after another round the core of his flexible thought, he was always creating something unexpected and singular, easily and gaily.

The palm of one of his hands had been pierced by a bullet, his fingers were crooked. I asked him how it happened.

"An équivoque of youthful romanticism," he replied. "You see, a man who has not tried to kill himself is very small beer."

Thereupon he sat down on the divan close to me and in superb fashion related how once, when a youth, he had thrown himself under a goods train, but fortunately fell between the rails, and the train rushed over him and merely stunned him.

There was something vague, unreal in the story, but he embellished it with an astonishingly vivid description of the sensations of a man over whom hundreds of ton loads are moving with an iron rumble. These sensations were familiar to me, too: as a lad of about ten I used to lie down under a ballast train, competing in audacity with my chums, one of whom, the postman's son, played the game with particular cool-headedness. It is an almost safe amusement, provided the furnace of the locomotive is raised high enough and the train is moving uphill, not downhill—for then the brake chains of the cars are tightly stretched, and can't strike you or, having caught you, fling you on to the sleepers. For a few seconds you experience an eerie sensation, you try to press as flat and close to the ground as possible, and with the exertion of your whole will to overcome the passionate desire to stir, to raise your head. You feel that the stream of iron and timber, rushing over you, tears you off the ground and wants to drag you off somewhere, and the rumble and grinding of the iron rings as it were in your bones. Then, when the train has passed, you still lie motionless for a minute or more, powerless to rise, seeming to swim along after the train; and it is as if your body stretches out endlessly, grows, becomes light, melts into air, and—the next moment you will be flying above the earth. It is very pleasant to feel all this.

"What fascinated you in such an absurd game?" asked Andreyev.

I said that perhaps we were testing the power of our wills, by opposing to the mechanical motion of huge masses the conscious immobility of our puny little bodies.

"No," he replied, "that is too good; no child could think that."

Reminding him of how children love to "tread the cradle"—to swing on the supple ice of a new frozen pond or of a shallow river bank, I said that they generally liked dangerous games.

"No, it can't be that, somehow. Nearly all children are afraid of the dark. . . . The poet said:

> There is delight in battle,
> And on the edge of a dark abyss;

but that is merely 'fine words,' nothing more. I have a different idea, but I can't quite get at it."

And suddenly he started up, as though touched by an inner fire. "I must write a story about a man who all his life long, suffering madly, sought the truth. And, behold, truth appeared to him, but he shut his eyes, stopped his ears, and said: 'I do not want thee, however fair thou mayest be, for my life, my torments have kindled in my soul a hatred of thee.' What do you think?"

I did not like the theme. He said, with a sigh: "Yes, one must first answer wherein lies the truth—in man or outside him? According to you—it is in man?"

And he burst out into laughter. "Then it is very bad, a very paltry affair."

Although he possessed a lively and sensitive imagination, he was lazy; he was much fonder of talking about literature than of creating it. The delight of martyr-like work at night in stillness and solitude seated before a white, clean sheet of paper, was almost impossible to him, he valued but little the joy of covering that sheet with the pattern of words.

"I write with difficulty. Writing is a strain on me," he would confess. "The nibs seem to me inconvenient, the process of writing—too slow and even degrading. My thoughts push about like jackdaws in a fire, I soon tire of catching them and arranging them in proper order. Often this is what happens: I have written a word—and suddenly I am caught in a cobweb—for no reason, I begin to think of geometry, algebra, and the teacher at my old school at Orel—a very stupid man, indeed. He often quoted the words of some philosopher: 'True wisdom is calm.' But I know that the best men on earth suffer torments of agitation. Curse calm wisdom! But what is there instead of it? Beauty? Vivat! However, although I have not seen Venus in the original, she seems to me from her photographs a rather silly female. As a rule, pretty things are always rather stupid. Take, for instance, a peacock, a greyhound, a woman. . . ."

Leonid was not fond of reading, and himself the maker of books—the creator of miracles—he looked upon old books distrustfully and heedlessly.

"A book to you is as a fetish is to a savage," he would say. "That is because you have not rubbed holes in your breeches on the benches of a public school, because you have not come into contact with university learning. But to me the Iliad, Pushkin, and all the rest are beslavered by teachers, prostituted by constipated officials. Sorrow through Knowledge [a play by Griboyedov] is as boring to me as Hall and Knight's Arithmetic. I am as sick of 'The Captain's Daughter' as I am of the little lady from the Tverskoy Boulevard."

I had heard these familiar words about the influence of the public school in one's attitude to literature too often, and they had long since sounded to me unconvincing, for one felt in them the prejudice begotten by Russian laziness. Much more original was Andreyev when describing how the reviews and critical articles in the papers mutilate and maim books, treating them in the style of reports of street accidents.

"They are mills, they grind Shakespeare, the Bible—anything you like—into the dust of banality. I once read in a paper a critical article on Don Quixote, and I suddenly saw with horror that Don Quixote was an old man of my acquaintance, a director of the Court of Exchequer; he had a chronic cold in the nose, and a mistress, a girl from a confectionery shop, whom he called by the grand name of Millie, but in actual life—on the boulevards—she was known as Sonka Bladder. . . ."

But although he regarded knowledge and books lightly, heedlessly, and at times with hostility, he was always keenly interested in what I was reading. On one occasion, seeing in my room at the Moscow Hotel Alexei Ostroumov's book on Sinesius, the Bishop of Ptolemais, he asked wonderingly: "What do you want this for?"

I told him about the queer half-pagan bishop, and read a few lines from his work In Praise of Baldness. "What [asks Sinesius] can be more bald yet what is more divine than the sphere?"

This pathetic exclamation from the descendant of Hercules drove Leonid into a fit of laughter, but immediately, wiping the tears from his eyes and still laughing he said: "You know, it is a superb subject for a story about an unbeliever who, wishing to test the stupidity of believers, assumes a mask of saintliness, lives the life of a martyr, preaches a new doctrine of God—a very stupid doctrine—and so attains the love and admiration of thousands. Then he says to his disciples and followers: 'All this is rubbish.' But they need a faith, and so they kill him."

I was struck by his words. The point was that Sinesius had expressed the same idea: "If I were told that a bishop must share the opinions of the people, I would reveal to all who I am. For what can there be in common between the rabble and philosophy? Divine truth must be hidden; the people need something quite different."

But I had not told Andreyev of that idea, nor had I the opportunity of telling him about the unusual position of the unbaptized pagan-philosopher in the role of bishop of a Christian Church. When eventually I did so, he exclaimed triumphantly and laughing: "There you see—one does not need to be always reading in order to know and to understand."

Leonid was talented by nature, organically talented; his intuition was astonishingly keen. In all that touched on the dark side of life, the contradictions in the human soul, the rumblings in the domain of the instincts, he had eerie powers of divination. The instance of Bishop Sinesius is not the only one; I could quote a score of such cases.

Thus, talking with him about various seekers after an unshakable belief, I related to him the contents of the MS. Confession, by the priest Apollonov—a work by one of the unknown martyrs of thought which had called forth Leo Tolstoy's Confession. I told him what I had observed personally of men of dogmatic beliefs: they often appear voluntary prisoners of a blind, unyielding faith, and the more they actively defend its validity the more despairingly they doubt it.

Andreyev mused for a while, slowly stirring his glass of tea; then he said, smiling: "It is strange to me that you understand this; you speak like an atheist, but you think as a believer. If you die before me I will inscribe on your gravestone: 'Crying to others to worship reason he himself secretly jeered at its impotence.' "

And in a couple of minutes leaning on my shoulder, glancing into my eyes with the dilated pupils of his dark eyes, he said in an undertone: "I shall write about a parson, you will see! This, my dear fellow, I shall do well!"

And threatening someone with his finger, vigorously rubbing his temples, he smiled. "Tomorrow I am going home and shall begin it! I have even got the opening sentence: 'Among people he was lonely, for he had a glimpse of a great mystery.' . . ."

Next day he went away to Moscow, and in a week's time—not more—he wrote to me that he was working on the parson, and that his work was going smoothly "as on snowshoes." Thus he always caught in flight anything that answered the needs of his spirit that was in contact with the most acute and tormenting mysteries of life.

The noisy success of his first book filled him to overflowing with youthful joy. He came to me at Nizhni—happy, in a brand new tobacco-colored suit; the front of his stiffly starched shirt was adorned with a rakishly bright tie, and on his feet he had yellow boots.

"I tried to find straw-colored gloves, but a lady in the shop at Kuznetsky warned me that straw-color was no longer the fashion. I suspect that she told a fib. The truth was she valued the freedom of her heart too much to risk becoming convinced of my irresistible attractiveness in straw-colored gloves. But, between ourselves, I can tell you that all this magnificence is uncomfortable; a blouse is much better."

And suddenly, hugging my shoulders, he said: "I want to write a hymn, you know. I don't yet see to whom or to what; but a hymn it must be! Something Schillerian, eh? Something grand, sonorous—boom-m!"

I chaffed him about it.

"Well!" he exclaimed merrily. "Is not Ecclesiastes right when he says: 'Even a rotten life is better than a good death.' Although he puts it rather differently, something about a lion and a dog: 'For domestic purposes a bad dog is more useful than a nice lion.' Well, what do you think: could Job have read the book of Ecclesiastes?"

Intoxicated with the wine of joy he dreamt of a journey on the Volga in a good boat, of walking to the Crimea.

"I'll drag you off, too. Otherwise you will build yourself in among these old bricks," he said, pointing to the books.

His happiness resembled the lively and comfortable state of a baby which has been hungry too long and now thinks it has eaten enough to last forever.

We sat on a wide divan, in a little room, drank red wine; Andreyev took down from the shelf a notebook of poems.

"May I?" he asked, and began reading aloud:

"Columns of coppery firs,
The monotonous sound of the sea.

"It is the Crimea? Now, I can't write poems, and I have no desire to. I like ballads best. As a rule:

"I love all that is new,
Romantic, nonsensical,
Like the poet
Of olden times.

"I believe that is a song in the musical comedy The Green Island:

"And the trees are moaning Like verses unrhymed.

"That I like. But—tell me—why do you write poems? It does not suit you at all. After all, whatever you may think, verse is an artificial business."

Then we composed parodies of Skitaletz:

I'll grasp a huge log
In my mighty hand,
And all of you—unto the seventh generation—
I will knock down flat!
Moreover I will stupefy you—
Hurrah! Tr-r-remble! I am glad—
I'll dash Kasbeck on your heads,
I'll bring down Ararat upon you!

He laughed as he went on composing verse after verse of delightful, amusing parodies. But suddenly bending toward me, with a glass of wine in his hand, he began in a low voice and gravely: "I read recently an amusing anecdote. In a certain English town there stands a memorial to Robert Burns, the poet. But there is no inscription on the memorial to inform you to whom it is erected. At the foot of it a boy was selling newspapers. A certain author came up to him and said: 'I'll buy a paper from you if you'll tell me whose statue this is.' 'Robert Burns,' the boy replied. 'Splendid!' said the author. 'Now I'll buy all your papers if you'll tell me why this memorial was erected to Robert Burns.' The boy replied: 'Because he is dead.' How do you like it?"

I did not like it much; I was always seriously perturbed by Leonid's sharp and sudden fluctuations of mood.

Fame to him was not merely "a bright patch on the bard's old rags"—he wanted a great deal of it, he wanted it greedily, and he made no secret of his desires. He said:

"When I was only fourteen I said to myself I shall be famous or life won't be worth living. I am not afraid of telling you that all that has been done before my time does not seem to me to be better than what I myself can do. If you take that for conceit, you are wrong. Yes! Don't you see that this must be the basic conviction of anyone who does not want to place himself in the impersonal ranks of the millions of others. Indeed, the conviction of one's uniqueness must—and can—serve as the source of creative power. First let us say to ourselves, We are not like all the others, and already we are on the way to prove this to all the rest as well."

"In a word you are a baby which does not want to feed at its nurse's breast."

"Just so! I want the milk of my soul only. Man needs love and attention, or that people should fear him. This even peasants realize, when they put on the mask of a sorcerer. Happiest of all are those who are loved with fear, as Napoleon was."

"Have you read his 'Memoirs'?"

"No. I don't need to." He winked at me, smiling: "I, too, keep a diary and I know how it is done. Memoirs, confessions, and such like are the excrements of the soul that is poisoned by bad food."

He loved such sayings, and when they were successful he was sincerely delighted. Despite his gravitation toward pessimism there was in him something ineradicably childish —for instance, his childishly naïve boasting about his verbal agility, of which he made much better use in conversation than on paper.

Once I told him about a woman who prided herself to such a degree on her "honest" life, and took so much trouble to convince all and sundry of her inaccessibility that those who surrounded her gasped from weariness, and either rushed headlong away from this model of virtue, or hated her to the verge of frenzy.

Andreyev listened, smiled, and suddenly said: "I am an honest woman, I am. I have no need to clean my nails, eh?"

In these words, with almost perfect exactness, he defined the character and even the habits of the creature of whom I was speaking—the woman was careless in her person. I told him this. He was delighted, and with childish sincerity began to boast: "My dear fellow, I am myself surprised at times to find how cleverly and pointedly I can in two or three words seize the very essence of a fact or of a character."

And he delivered a long speech in praise of himself; but —sensible man that he was—he realized that this was a trifle ridiculous, and he ended his tirade with a touch of buffoonery.

"In time I shall develop my capacity as a genius to such an extent that I shall be able to define in a single word the meaning of the whole life of a man, of a nation, of an epoch. . . ."

Yet the critical attitude toward himself was not particularly strongly developed in him; and this at times greatly spoiled his work and his life.

In every one of us, to my thinking, live and struggle embryos of several personalities. These dispute between themselves until, in the struggle, there is developed the embryo which is the strongest and most capable of adapting itself to the various reactions to impressions which form the final spiritual character of a man, thus creating a more or less complete psychical individuality.

Strangely and to his own torment Leonid split into two: in one and the same week he could sing "Hosannah" to the world, and pronounce "Anathema" against it.

This was not an external contradiction between the bases of his character and the habits or demands of his profession; —no, in both cases he felt equally sincerely. And, the more loudly he proclaimed Hosannah, the more powerfully resounded the echo Anathema.

He said: "I hate individuals who refuse to walk on the sunny side of the street for fear that their faces may be burnt or their jackets faded—I hate all those who for dogmatic motives hamper the free, capricious play of their inner ego."

Once he wrote a rather caustic article on the people of the shady side, and immediately after this—on the occasion of Emile Zola's death from gas fumes—engaged in a vigorous attack on the barbarous asceticism at that time fairly popular among the intelligentsia. But talking to me about that attack he declared suddenly: "And yet, you know, my opponent is more consistent than I am: a writer ought to live like a homeless tramp. Maupassant's yacht is an absurdity."

He was not joking. We had an argument. I maintained: the more varied the needs of man, the more eager he is for the joys of life, however paltry, the quicker develops the culture of the body and of the spirit. He retorted: No, Tolstoy is right, culture is rubbish, it only maims the free growth of the soul.

" 'Attachment to things,' " he would say, "is the fetishism of savages, idolatry. Don't make an idol for yourself; if you do you are rotten—that is the truth! Make a book today, and tomorrow make a machine. Yesterday you made a boot, and you have already forgotten about it. We must learn to forget."

And I said: "It is necessary to remember that each thing is the embodiment of the human spirit, and often the inner value of a thing is more significant than man."

"That is worship of dead matter," he exclaimed.

"In it is embodied immortal thought."

"What is thought? Its impotence makes it double-faced and disgusting."

We argued more and more often, more and more intensely. The sharpest point of difference was our attitude to thought.

To me, thought is the source of all that exists; out of thought arose everything that is seen and felt by man; even in the consciousness of its impotence to solve the "accursed questions" thought is majestic and noble.

I feel that I live in the atmosphere of thought, and, seeing the great and grand things that have been created by it, I believe that its impotence is temporary. Perhaps I am romancing and exaggerate the creative power of thought; but this is so natural in Russia, in a country where there is no spiritual synthesis, in a country paganly sensual, monstrously cruel.

Leonid regarded thought as a "wicked trick played on man by the devil"; it seemed to him false and hostile. Luring man to the abysses of inexplicable mysteries it deceives him, it leaves him in painful and impotent loneliness in front of all that is mysterious, and itself vanishes.

No less irreconcilably did we differ in our views on man, the source of thought, its furnace. To me man is always the conqueror, even when he is mortally wounded and dying. Splendid is his longing to know himself and to know Nature; and although his life is a torment, he is ever widening its bounds, creating with his thought wise science, marvelous art. I felt that I did sincerely and actively love man—him who is at present alive and working side by side with me, and him, too, the sensible, the good, the strong who will follow after in the future. To Andreyev man appeared poor in spirit, a creature interwoven of irreconcilable contradictions of instinct and intellect, forever deprived of the possibility of attaining inner harmony. All his works are "vanity of vanities," decay, and self-deception. And, above all, he is the slave of death and all his life long he walks dragging its chain.

White Nights

I once told Leonid of how I had once to go through a hard time of "the prisoner's dream of life beyond the bounds of his prison," of "stony darkness," of "immobility forever poised." He jumped up from the divan and, pacing the room, waving his maimed hand, he said hurriedly, indignantly, gasping for breath: "It is cowardice, my dear fellow, to shut the book without reading it to the end! In the book is your indictment, in it you are denied, don't you see? You are denied along with everything there is in you, with your humanitarianism, socialism, aesthetics, love—isn't all this nonsense according to the book? It is ridiculous and pitiable: you have been sentenced to death—for what? And you, pretending that you are not aware of the fact, play about with little flowers, deceiving yourself and others —silly little flowers! . . ."

I pointed out to him the futility of protesting against an earthquake; I argued that protests cannot in the least affect the tremors of the earth's crust. All this merely angered him.

We talked in Petersburg, in the autumn, in an empty, depressing room on the fifth floor. The city was enveloped in a thick mist; in its gray mass the ghostly rainbow globes of the street lamps hung motionless like huge bubbles.

Through the thin cotton wool of the mist absurd sounds rose up from the well of the street. Wearisome above all else were the hoofs of the horses drumming on the wooden blocks of the road.

Leonid went and stood by the window, with his back to me. I realized keenly that at that moment he hated me as a man who walked the earth more easily and more freely than he, because he had thrown from his shoulders a humiliating and useless burden.

Even before this I had felt in him sharp spurtings of anger against me, but I can't say that this offended me, although it did alarm me; I understood—in my own way certainly—the source of his anger, and how life was hard on this rarely gifted man, dear to me and—at that time—my intimate friend.

There, below, the fire brigade dashed along noisily. Leonid came up to me, threw himself on the divan, and suggested: "Shall we drive to see the fire?"

"In Petersburg a fire isn't interesting."

He agreed.

"True, but in the provinces, in Orel, say, when streets of wooden buildings are burning and the people dash about like moths—it is nice! And pigeons over the cloud of smoke—have you ever seen that?"

Hugging my shoulders he said, smiling: "You see everything—the devil take you! 'Stony emptiness'—that is very good. Stony darkness and emptiness! You do understand the mood of the captive. . . ."

And butting my side with his head: "At times I hate you for this as I do a beloved woman who is cleverer than myself."

I said I felt this, and that only a minute before he had hated me.

"Yes," he agreed, nestling his head on my knees. "Do you know why? I wish you were aching with my pain, then we should be nearer to one another—you really do know how lonely I am!"

Yes, he was very lonely, but at times it appeared to me that he jealously guarded his loneliness; it was dear to him as the source of his fantastic inspirations and the fertile soil of his originality.

"You lie when you say that scientific thought satisfies you," he said sternly, looking darkly at the ceiling with scared eyes. "Science, my dear fellow, is only mysticism dealing with facts: nobody knows anything—that's the truth. And the problem: how I think and why I think, is the source of man's greatest torment—this is the most terrible truth! Come, let's go off somewhere, please. . . ."

Whenever he touched on the problem of the mechanism of thinking, he became most agitated. And frightened.

We put on our coats, descended into the mist, and for a couple of hours swam in it on the Nevsky like eels at the bottom of a slimy river. Then we sat in a café and three girls pressed themselves on us, one of them a graceful Esthonian who called herself Elfrida. Her face was stony; she looked at Andreyev out of large, gray, lusterless eyes, with eerie gravity, while she drank a greenish venomous liqueur out of a coffee cup. It smelt of burnt leather.

Leonid drank cognac, rapidly got tipsy, became riotously witty, made the girls laugh by his surprisingly amusing and ingenious jokes, and at last decided to drive to the girls' flat—they were very insistent on this. To leave Leonid was impossible; whenever he began drinking, something uncanny awoke in him, a revengeful need of destruction, the fury of "the captured beast."

I went with him. We bought wine, fruit, sweets, and, somewhere in the Razyezhaya Street, in the corner of a dirty courtyard, blocked up with casks and timber, on the second floor of a wooden outbuilding, in two tiny rooms, the walls wretchedly and pathetically adorned with picture postcards—we began to drink.

Before he got to the state in which he would lose consciousness Leonid always became dangerously and wonderfully excited, his brain boiled up riotously, his imagination flared, his speech became almost intolerably brilliant.

One of the girls, plump, soft, and agile as a mouse, told us, almost with rapture, how the assistant crown prosecutor had bitten her leg above the knee; she evidently considered the lawyer's action the most significant event of her life. She showed the scar left by the bite and, choking with agitation, her little glassy eyes shining with joy, said: "He was awfully gone on me, it's quite frightening to remember it! He bit, you know, and he had a false tooth—and it stuck in my skin!"

This girl quickly got drunk, tumbled down in a corner of the couch, and fell asleep, snoring. The full-bodied, thick-haired, chestnut-colored girl, with sheepish eyes and monstrously long arms, played the guitar, and Elfrida deliberately undressed until she was stark naked, moved the bottles and plates onto the floor, jumped on the table, and danced silently, wriggling like a serpent without taking her eyes from Leonid. Then she began to sing in an unpleasantly thick voice, with angrily dilated eyes, and now and then, as though broken in half, she bent over Andreyev. He kissed her knees, repeating the words he had caught up of the strange foreign song, while he nudged me with his elbow and said: "She understands something, look at her, do you see? She understands!"

At moments Leonid's excited eyes seemed to go blind; growing still darker they sank deeper, as if in an attempt to peer inside his brain.

Grown tired, the Esthonian jumped from the table to the bed, stretched herself, her mouth open, stroking with her palms her little breasts, sharp as a she-goat's.

Leonid said: "Perhaps the earth, just like this bitch here, is rushing about in the desert of the universe expecting me to impregnate her with the realization of the purpose of life, and I myself, with all that is marvelous in me, am only a spermatozoon."

I suggested to him that we should go home.

"Go, I will stay here. . . ."

I could not leave him—he was already very drunk, and he had a good deal of money on him. He sat down on the bed, stroking the girl's finely shaped legs, and began in an amusing way to tell her he loved her. She never let her eyes leave his face, her head resting on her hands.

"The baron has only to eat horse-radish to grow wings," Leonid said.

"No, it isn't true," the girl said gravely.

"I told you she understands something!" exclaimed Leonid in drunken joy. In a few minutes he went out of the room. I gave the girl money, and asked her to persuade Leonid to go for a drive. She instantly agreed, jumped up, and began quickly to dress.

"I am afraid of him," she murmured. "Men like him pull out revolvers."

The girl who played the guitar fell asleep, sitting on the floor near the couch where her friend slept and snored.

The Esthonian was dressed by the time Leonid returned. He began making a row, and shouted: "I don't want to go! Let there be a feast of the flesh!"

And he attempted to undress the girl again; but, struggling with him, she gazed so stubbornly into his eyes that her look tamed Leonid, and he agreed: "Let us go!"

But he wanted to put on the lady's hat à la Rembrandt, and had already plucked out the feathers.

"You'll pay for the hat?" the girl asked in a businesslike fashion.

Leonid raised his brows and burst into laughter. "The hat settles it! Hooray!"

In the street we took a cab and drove through the mist. It was still not late, about midnight. The Nevsky, with its huge beads of lamps, looked like a road going downhill into a hollow; round the lamps flitted wet particles of dust; in the gray dampness black fishes swam standing on their tails; the hemispheres of the umbrellas seemed to draw people up—all was very ghostly, strange, and sad.

In the open air Andreyev became completely drunk. He fell into a doze, swaying from side to side. The girl whispered to me: "I'll get out. Shall I?"

And, jumping from my knees into the liquid mud of the street, she disappeared.

At the end of the Kamenoi Ostrovsky Prospect Leonid asked, opening his eyes with a start: "Are we driving? I want to go to a pub. You sent her away?"

"She went away."

"You are lying! You are cunning, so am I. I left the room in order to see what you would do. I stood behind the door and heard you urging her to make me go for a drive. You behaved innocently and nobly. When it comes to the point, you are a bad man. You drink a lot but don't get drunk, and because of this your children will be dipsomaniacs. My father also drank a great deal and did not get drunk, and I am an alcoholic."

Then we sat and smoked in the "Strelka," under the stupid bubble of the mist, and when the light of our cigarettes flared up we could see our overcoats covered with dim glass beads of dampness turning to gray.

Leonid spoke with boundless frankness, and it was not the frankness of a drunken man. His mind was scarcely affected until the moment when the poison of the alcohol completely stopped the working of his brain.

"You have done and are doing a great deal for me—even today, I quite understand. If I had remained with the girls it would have ended badly for someone. Just so. But it is just because of this that I don't love you, precisely because of this! You prevent me from being myself. Leave me! I want to expand. Perhaps you are the hoop on the cask; you will go away and the cask will fall to pieces; but let it fall to pieces—do you understand? Nothing should be restrained; let everything be destroyed. Perhaps the true meaning of life consists indeed in the destruction by something which we don't know, of everything that has been thought out and made by us."

His dark eyes were fixed sternly on the gray mass around and above him; now and then he turned them toward the wet, leaf-strewn ground, and he stamped his feet as though testing the firmness of the earth.

"I don't know what you think, but what you always say is not the expression of your faith, of your prayer. You say that all the forces of life spring from the violation of equilibrium. But you yourself are indeed seeking for an equilibrium, for some kind of harmony, and are urging me to seek for the same thing; whereas—on your own showing—equilibrium is death!"

I said I was not urging him to anything, I had no wish to urge him, but his life was dear to me, his health was dear, his work.

"It is only my work that pleases you—my external self, but not I myself, not that which I cannot incarnate in work. You stand in my way and in everybody's way. Into the mud with you!"

He leant on my shoulder and, peering into my face with a smile, he went on: "You think I am drunk and don't realize that I am talking nonsense? I simply want to make you angry. You are a rare friend, I know, and you are stupidly disinterested, and I am a farceur begging for attention, like a beggar who shows his sores."

This he said not for the first time, and I recognized a grain of truth in it. Or rather, a cleverly contrived explanation of certain peculiarities of his character.

"I, my dear fellow, am a decadent, a degenerate, a sick man. But Dostoievsky was also a sick man, as are all great men. There's a book, I don't remember by whom, about genius and insanity, it proves that genius is a psychical disease! That little book has spoiled me. If I had not read it I should be a simpler man. And now, I know that I am almost a genius, but I am not sure whether I am sufficiently insane? Do you understand? I pretend to myself to be insane in order to convince myself of my talent—do you see?"

I burst out laughing. This seemed to me a poor invention, and therefore untrue.

When I said so, he also burst out laughing, and suddenly, with a flexible movement of his soul, with the agility of an acrobat, he leapt into the tone of a humorist: "Ah! Where is a pub, the temple of literary worship? Talented Russians must necessarily converse in pubs. That is the tradition, and without it the critics won't admit talent."

We sat in a night-tavern for cabmen, in damp, smoky stuffiness. The "waiters" raced about the dirty room angrily and wearily, drunken men swore portentously, terrible prostitutes screamed, and one of them bared her left breast —huge and yellow—put it on a plate, presented it to us, saying: "Won't you buy a pound?"

"I love shamelessness," said Leonid. "In cynicism I feel the sadness, almost the despair of man who realizes that he can't—do you understand?—that he can't help being a beast. He wants not to be one, but he can't! Do you understand?"

He drank strong, almost black tea. I knew that he liked it so, and that it sobered him, and I purposely ordered it strong. Sipping the tarry, bitter liquid, his eyes probing the puffed-up faces of the drunkards, Leonid spoke uninterruptedly: "With women I am cynical. It's the more truthful way—and they love it. It's better to be a consum-mate sinner than a righteous man who can't puff himself up into a state of complete saintliness."

He glanced round, was silent for a while, and said: "Here it is as boring as an ecclesiastical council!"

This made him laugh.

"I've never been at an ecclesiastical council, it must be something like a fish pond. . . ."

The tea sobered him. We left the tavern. The mist thickened, the opalescent globes of the street lamps melted like ice.

"I should like some fish," said Leonid, as he leant his elbows on the parapet of the bridge across the Neva, and continued with animation: "You know my way? Probably children think like that. A child will pitch on a word and begin to pick out words that rhyme to it: fish, dish, butter, gutter—but I can't write verse."

After thinking for a while he added: "Makers of children's alphabets think like that. . . ."

Again we sat in a tavern treating ourselves to a bouillabaisse; Leonid was saying that the "decadents" had invited him to contribute to their review Viessy.

"I shan't accept, I don't like them. With them I feel there is no body behind their words. They 'intoxicate' themselves with words, as Balmont is fond of saying. He, too, is talented and—sick."

On another occasion, I remember, he said of the Scorpion group: "They outrage Schopenhauer, and I love him, and therefore hate them."

But, on his lips, this was too strong a word—to hate was beyond him, he was too gentle for that. Once he showed me in his diary "words of hatred," but they turned out to be merely humorous, and he himself laughed heartily at them.

I saw him to his hotel in a cab, and put him to bed. But when I called in the afternoon, I learned that immediately after I left, he got up, dressed, and disappeared. I searched for him the whole day, but could not find him.

He drank continuously for four days, and then went away to Moscow.

He had an unpleasant way of testing the sincerity of people's mutual relations. He did it like this: suddenly he would ask, as if by the way, "Do you know what Z. said about you?" Or he would let you know, "S. says of you . . ." And with a dark glance he would look into your eyes as if to test you.

Once I said to him: "Look here, if you go on like that you will end by setting all your friends against one another!"

"What of it?" he replied, "if they quarrel for trifles like that, it only shows that their relations were not sincere."

"Well, what do you want?"

"Stability, a sort of monumental firmness, beauty of relationship. Each one of us ought to realize how delicate is the lace of the soul, how tenderly and warily it should be regarded. A certain romanticism is needed in the relations between friends; it used to exist in Pushkin's circle, and I envy them it. Women are sensitive only to eroticism. The woman's gospel is the Decameron."

But in half an hour's time he scoffed at his view of women, as he gave a droll description of a conversation between an erotomaniac and a public-school girl.

He could not stand Artsybashev and at times scoffed at him with crude hostility just for his one-sided presentations of woman as exclusively sensual.

Once he told me this story. When he was about eleven he saw, somewhere in a wood or park, the deacon kissing a young girl.

"They kissed one another, and both cried," he said, lowering his voice and shrinking. Whenever he told anything intimate, his limp muscles became strained and keyed up.

"The young girl, you see, was so slim and fragile, little legs like matches; the deacon—fat, the cassock on his belly greasy and shiny. I already knew why people kissed, but it was the first time I saw them crying when they kissed, and I thought it funny. The deacon's beard got caught on the girl's open blouse. He began wriggling his head. I whistled in order to frighten them—but got frightened myself and ran away. On the evening of that very same day I felt myself in love with the daughter of our magistrate, a girl of ten. I touched her: she had no breasts. So there was nothing to kiss, and she was not fit for love. Then I fell in love with a neighbor's maid, a short-legged girl, with white eyebrows, with enormous breasts—the blouse on her bosom was as greasy as the cassock on the deacon's belly. I approached her very resolutely, and she as resolutely pulled my ear. But this did not prevent me from loving her. She seemed to me a beauty, and the longer I knew her the more beautiful she seemed. It was almost torture and very sweet. I saw many really beautiful girls and in my mind I well understood that my beloved was a monster compared with them, and yet to me she remained the fairest of all. This knowledge made me happy; nobody could love as I did that fat hussy with her white eyebrows and white eyelashes. Nobody—do you understand?—could see in her one fairer than the fairest!"

He told this superbly, saturating his account with delightful humor, which I cannot reproduce. What a pity, that he who in conversation was such a master of humor neglected or was afraid to enrich his stories with its play. Evidently he was afraid of spoiling the dark tones of his pictures with the varied colors of humor.

When I said it was a pity that he had forgotten how well he succeeded in creating out of the short-legged maid the first beauty in the world, that he no longer wished to extract the golden veins of beauty from the dirty mine of reality, he screwed up his eyes, comically and slyly, saying: "See what a sweet tooth you have got! No, I am not going to pamper you, you romantics. . . ."

It was impossible to persuade him it was just he who was the romantic.

"I have written a story which you are sure not to like," he once said to me. "Shall we read it?"

We read it. I liked the story very much, save for a few details.

"That's a trifle, that I'll correct," he said with animation, pacing the room, shuffling with his slippers. Then he sat down by my side and throwing back his hair he glanced into my eyes. "Well, I know, I feel that you were sincere in praising that story. But I can't understand how it can please you."

"There are many things on earth which don't please me; yet, so far as I can see, they are none the worse for it."

"Reasoning like that you can't be a revolutionary."

"Now do you look up to a revolutionary as Nechayev did, who held that a revolutionary is not a man?"

He embraced me and laughed. "You don't properly understand yourself. But, look here, when I wrote Thought I had you in mind. Alexei Savelov is you. There is one phrase there: 'Alexei was not talented'—this perhaps was wrong on my part, but with your stubbornness you so irritate me at times that you seem to me without talent. It was wrong of me to have written it, wasn't it?"

He was agitated, he even blushed.

I calmed him, saying that I did not consider myself an Arab horse, but only a dray horse. I knew that I owed my success not so much to my inborn talent as to my capacity for work, my love of work.

"You are a strange man," he said softly, interrupting my words, and suddenly, changing the tone of the conversation, he began musingly to speak of himself, of the agitations of his soul. He lacked the unpleasant general Russian habit of confessing and of doing penance. But at times he managed to speak of himself with manly frankness, even severity, yet without losing his self-respect. And this was pleasant in him.

"You understand," he said, "every time I write something that particularly agitates me I feel as though a crust had fallen from my soul; I see myself more clearly and I see that I am more talented than the thing written. Take Thought. I expected it would astonish you, and now I myself see that it is, essentially, a story with a purpose which, even so, misses the mark."

He jumped to his feet, and, shaking back his hair, half-jokingly declared: "I'm afraid of you, you rascal! You are stronger than I. I don't want to submit to you."

And again gravely: "Something is lacking in me, my dear fellow. Something very important—eh? What do you think?"

I thought that he treated his talent with unpardonable carelessness and that he lacked knowledge.

"One must study, read, go to Europe. . . ."

He waved his hand. "It isn't that. One must find a God for oneself and learn to believe in his wisdom."

He suffered cruelly from hereditary alcoholism; his malady would manifest itself at comparatively rare intervals, but nearly always in a very aggravated form. He fought against it, the struggle cost him enormous efforts, but, at times, falling into despair he scoffed at his efforts.

"I'll write a story about a man who, from his youth onward, was for twenty-five years afraid to drink a thimbleful of vodka. Because of this he lost a multitude of splendid hours in life, he spoilt his career, and died in his prime through having cut his corn unsuccessfully or run a splinter into his finger."

And indeed, when he came to see me at Nizhni, he brought with him the MS. of that very story.

Lady Shura

In Nizhni Leonid met at my house Father Feodor Vladimirsky, the archpriest of the town of Arzamas, who subsequently became a member of the Second State Duma—a remarkable man. Sometime I will try and write about him fully, and meanwhile I find it necessary briefly to outline the chief deed of his life.

The town of Arzamas, almost from the time of Ivan the Terrible, obtained its water from ponds, where, in the summer, swam corpses of drowned cats, rats, fowls, dogs, while in the winter, under the ice, the water became tainted, and had a disgusting smell. Father Feodor, having made it his object to supply the town with wholesome water, spent twelve years in investigating personally the hidden waters around Arzamas. Every summer, year in and year out, he rose at dawn and wandered like a sorcerer about the fields and woods, observing where the ground "perspired." And after long labor he found hidden sub-soil springs, traced their course, canalized them, conducted them to a forest hollow a couple of miles from the town; and having obtained for a population of ten thousand over a hundred thousand gallons of superb spring water, proposed to the town the laying down of a water supply.

The town had a sum of money bequeathed to it by a merchant to be used either for the laying down of a water supply or for the founding of a credit bank. The tradespeople and the authorities, who employed horses to carry their water in barrels from remote springs outside the town, had no need of a water supply, and using all means to hinder the work of Father Feodor, tried to get hold of the capital for the establishment of a credit bank; while the unimportant inhabitants swallowed the tainted water of the ponds, indifferent and passive, in conformity with their immemorial custom. Thus, having found water, Father Feodor was compelled to carry on a long and tedious struggle with the stubborn selfishness of the rich and the villainous stupidity of the poor.

When I arrived at Arzamas under police surveillance * I found him at the end of his work gathering together the springs. Exhausted as he was by drudgery and misfortune, that man was the first Arzamasian who dared to make my acquaintance. The wise Arzamasian authorities had most strictly forbidden the employees of the Zemstvo and all other civil servants to visit me, and, in order to intimidate them, had established a police post just under my windows.

Father Feodor came to me one evening, in pouring rain, soaking wet from head to foot, soiled with clay, in heavy peasant boots, in a gray cassock, and in a faded hat—it was so wet that it looked like a lump of soaked clay. Pressing my hand tightly with his horny digger's hand, he said in a stern little bass voice: "Are you the unrepentant sinner who has been foisted on us for the good of your soul? We will do your soul good! Can you treat me to tea?"

* Gorky was forbidden to reside in any of the large towns of Russia, and as punishment for his political views was exiled by the authorities to the remote provincial town of Arzamas.

In his gray little beard the dried-up little face of an ascetic was hidden. From his deep sockets shone the meek smile of understanding eyes. "I have come straight from the forest. Have you any clothes into which I could change?"

I had already heard a great deal about him. I knew that his son was a political exile, one daughter was in prison "for politics," a second daughter was intent on her preparations to get there. I knew that he had already spent all his means on this search for water, had mortgaged his house, and was now living like a pauper, himself digging ditches in the forest and stopping them with clay. When his strength failed he would implore the neighboring peasants, for the love of Christ, to lend him a hand. They would help him; but the townspeople, skeptically watching the work of this "queer" parson, would not lift a finger.

It was this man whom Leonid Andreyev met at my house.

It was October, a dry cold day; the wind was blowing, in the streets scraps of paper, birds' feathers, and onion peels were flying about. The dust scratched against the window panes; a huge rain cloud moved from the fields to the town. Suddenly, into our room came Father Feodor, rubbing his dust-covered eyes, shaggy, angry, cursing the thief who had stolen his handbag and umbrella, and the governor general who refused to understand that a water supply is more useful than a credit bank. Leonid opened his eyes wide and whispered to me: "What is this?"

An hour later, at the samovar, with his mouth quite agape, he listened to the archpriest of the absurd town of Arzamas denouncing the Gnostics for having fought against the democratic principles of the Church and for trying to make instruction in the knowledge of God inaccessible to the people.

"These heretics consider themselves seekers after the highest knowledge, aristocrats of the spirit. But are not the people, in the persons of their wisest guides, the embodiment of the wisdom of God and of His spirit?"

"Docetists," "Ophites," "pleroma," "Karpocratus"—Father Feodor droned on, and Leonid, nudging me with his elbow, whispered: "There is the Arzamasian horror incarnate!"

But soon he was waving his hand in front of Father Feodor's face as he proved to him the impotence of thought; and the priest, shaking his beard, retorted: "It is not thought that is impotent but unbelief."

"But that is the essence of thought. . . ."

"You are sophisticated, Mr. Author. . . ."

The rain lashed the window panes, the old man and the young one rummaged among ancient wisdom, and from the wall Leo Tolstoy, with the little stick in his hand—the great pilgrim of this world—gazed down on them. Having overthrown everything we could in the time, we went to our rooms long after midnight. I was already in bed, with a book, when there came a knock at my door and Leonid appeared, disheveled, agitated, his shirt collar undone; he sat down on my bed and began rapturously: "What a parson! How he found me out, eh?"

And suddenly tears gleamed in his eyes. "Lucky fellow you, Alexei, the devil take you. You always have wonderfully interesting people round you, and I—am lonely . . . or I have hanging on to me . . ."

He waved his hand. I began telling him of the life of Father Feodor, how he had been seeking for water, of the book he had written, The History of the Old Testament, the MS. of which had been taken away from him by order of the Synod; of his book Love the Law of Life, also forbidden by the ecclesiastical censorship. In that book Father Feodor proved by quotations from Pushkin and from other poets that the feeling of love, as between one man and another, was the basis of life and of the progress of the world, that it was as powerful as the law of universal gravitation, and resembled it in every respect.

"Yes," said Leonid musingly, "there are things I must learn; otherwise I feel ashamed before the parson. . . ."

Another knock at the door. Enter Father Feodor, folding his cassock round him, barefooted, sad.

"You are not asleep? So, well . . . Here I am! I heard talking, I thought I'd come and apologize! I rather shouted, young people, but don't take offense. . . . I lay down, thought of you. You are nice people. I decided that I had grown warm for no reason. . . . Now, here I am, forgive me! I'm going to bed. . . ."

Both sat down on the bed, and again began an endless conversation. Leonid, elated, laughed again and again.

"What a country this Russia of ours is! 'Look here, we haven't yet solved the problem of the existence of God, and you are calling us to dinner!' It is not Bielinsky who says this, it is what all Russia says to Europe. For Europe, in the main, calls us to dine, to feed well, nothing but this!"

And Father Feodor, wrapping his thin, bony legs in his cassock, smilingly replied: "After all, Europe is our godmother, don't forget it! Without her Voltaires, without her men of science, we should not now be disputing about matters philosophical, but should be silently swallowing pancakes—and only that!"

At daybreak Father Feodor left us, and in a couple of hours he was gone—to set about work again on the Arzamasian water supply. And Leonid, having slept till evening, said to me then: "Just think, in whose interest and for what purpose is it that in this rotten little town a parson should live who is energetic, interesting, and a wizard? And why, indeed, should the parson of this town be a wizard, eh? What nonsense! You know one can live only in Moscow. Come, leave this place. It is horrid here—rain, dirt . . ."

And immediately he began preparing to go home.

At the railway station he said: "And yet this parson is an oddity. It is all a story!"

He complained more than once that he scarcely met any big, original people: "Now, you can find them; while only burrs that I drag along on my tail stick to me. Why is it?"

I mentioned people whose acquaintance would be useful to him—men of high culture or of original mind. I spoke to him of V. V. Rosanov and others. It seemed to me that an acquaintance with Rosanov would be extremely useful to Andreyev. He was surprised! "I can't make you out!"

And he spoke of Rosanov's conservatism, which he need not have done, since his essential self was profoundly indifferent to politics, only now and then displaying fits of external curiosity about them. His real attitude to political activities be expressed most sincerely in his story As It Was—So It Will Be.

I tried to prove to him that one can learn from the devil himself or a thief as well as from a saintly recluse, and that study does not mean submission.

"That is not quite true," he replied, "all learning represents submission to facts. And Rosanov I don't like. He reminds me of the dog in the Bible who returns to his vomit."

At times it seemed as if he avoided personal acquaintance with big people, because he was afraid of their influence on him. He would meet one once or twice. Sometimes he would praise him ardently; but his interest was short-lived.

So it was with Savva Morosov. After the first long conversation with him L. Andreyev, carried away by the man's subtle mind, wide knowledge, and energy, called him Yermak Timofeyevich (the conqueror of Siberia), and said that he would play a great political role. "He has the face of a Tartar; but, my dear fellow, he is an English lord!"

And Savva Morosov said of Andreyev: "He only appears self-assured; but he does not feel confidence in himself and seeks to obtain it from his mind. But his mind wavers. He knows that and does not trust it. . . ."

I write as my memory prompts me, with no care for sequence or for chronology.

In the Moscow Art Theater, when it was still in Karetny Row, Leonid introduced me to his fiancée, a slim, fragile girl with lovely clear eyes. Modest, reserved, she appeared to me unoriginal; but I soon became convinced that she was a person of an understanding heart.

She realized splendidly the need of a maternal, watchful attitude to Andreyev; at once she comprehended deeply the significance of his talent and the tormenting fluctuations of his mood. She was one of those rare women who, capable of being passionate mistresses, are yet able to love with the love of a mother. This double love armed her with a subtle knowledge, so that she had a marvelous understanding of the genuine complainings of his soul as well as of the high-sounding words of a capricious passing mood.

As is known, a Russian "for a word witty does neither father nor mother pity." Leonid, too, was very much carried away by words "witty," and at times composed maxims in very dubious taste.

"A year after marriage a wife is like a well-worn boot: one does not feel it," he said once in the presence of Alexandra Michailovna (his wife). She was capable of taking no notice of such verbal play, and at times even found these pranks of the tongue witty, and laughed caressingly. But, possessing in a high degree a sense of self-respect, she could —if need be—show herself very obstinate, even immovable. Subtly developed in her was a taste for the music of words, for forms of speech. She was small, lithe, elegant, and at times somewhat amusingly, childishly grave—I nicknamed her Lady Shura.* The name stuck to her.

Leonid valued her, and she lived in constant concern for him, in a continuous tension of all her powers. Her personality was completely sacrificed to her husband's interests.

At the Andreyevs' house in Moscow, authors often met together; it was very crowded and cozy. Feodor Chaliapin often put in an appearance, fascinating everyone with his stories. Lady Shura's lovely eyes, smiling caressingly, restrained to a certain extent the spirit of Russian natures.

When "modernism" was in full flower, an attempt was made at the Andreyev gatherings to understand it. But on the whole it was condemned, which was much the simplest way. There was no time to think seriously of literature; war and politics were of first importance. Blok, Byely, Bryussov, appeared "isolated provincials"—in the most favorable opinion, queer fellows; in the least favorable, something like traitors to "the great traditions of the Russian commonwealth." I also thought and felt like that. Was it the time for a "Symphony," when the whole of Russia was gloomily making ready to dance the trepak? Events were moving toward a catastrophe; the symptoms of its approach were becoming ever more and more ominous. The Social Revolutionaries were throwing bombs; and each explosion shook the whole country, calling forth an intense expectation of a fundamental overthrow of social life. It was in Andreyev's flat that the sittings of the Central Committee of the Social Democrats—the Bolsheviks—took place; and once the whole committee, together with the host, was arrested and carried off to prison.

* Shura is a diminutive of Alexandra.

Having spent a month in prison, Andreyev came out as though from the pool of Siloam, hearty and cheerful.

"It does one good to be tied down," he said, "it makes you want to fly out in all directions!"

And he laughed at me.

"Well now, pessimist. Is not Russia coming to life? And you rhymed: 'Autocracy—gone rusty.'"

He published then his stories The Marseillaise, The Alarm, The Story Which Will Never Be Finished. But already in October 1905 he read to me the MS. of his story As It Was. "Is it not premature?" I asked.

"The good is always premature," he answered.

Soon he went off to Finland, and was right in doing so: the senseless brutality of the December events would have crushed him. In Finland he was active politically; he spoke at meetings, published in Helsingfors papers bitter attacks on the policy of the Monarchists. But his mood was depressed, his view on the future hopeless. In Petrograd I received a letter from him. Among other things he wrote: "Each horse has its inborn peculiarities; nations too. There are horses for which all roads lead to the public house: our country is now turned toward a goal most beloved by it, and for a long time it will go on in a drunken frenzy."

A few months later we met in Switzerland, at Montreux. Leonid jeered at the life of the Swiss. He would say: "We people of large plains can't live in these cockroach holes."

It appeared to me he had become somewhat faded, dimmed; a glassy expression of fatigue and of disquieting sadness showed in his eyes. Of Switzerland he spoke as flatly, as superficially, and in the same words, as the freedom-loving inhabitants of Tchukhloma, Konotop, and Tetiushi have been wont to speak for ever so long. One of these defined the Russian notion of freedom profoundly and pointedly in these words: "In our town we live as in a public bath, without restrictions, without ceremony."

About Russia Leonid spoke reluctantly and tediously; and once, sitting by the fireplace, he recalled a few lines of Yakoubovich's melancholy poem "To My Country":

> Why should we love thee,
> Art thou our mother?

"I have written a play. Shall we read it?"

And in the evening he read Savva.

While he was still in Russia, hearing about young Ufimtsev and his comrades who attempted to blow up the icon of the Virgin of Kursk, Andreyev decided to work this episode into a story; and immediately he proceeded to create the plan of the story and definitely to outline the characters. He was particularly fascinated by Ufimtsev, a poet in the domain of scientific technique, a youth who possessed the undoubted talent of an inventor. Exiled to the Semiretchensk province, I believe to Karkaraly, living there under the strict surveillance of men ignorant and superstitious, who denied him the necessary tools and materials, he invented an original motor of internal combustion, perfected the cyclostyle, worked on a new system of dredging, invented a "permanent cartridge" for sporting guns. I showed the designs of his motor to engineers at Moscow, and they told me that Ufimtsev's invention was very practical, ingenious, and clever. I don't know the fate of all these inventions; having settled abroad I lost sight of Ufimtsev.

But I knew that this Ufimtsev was among those superb dreamers who, carried away by their belief and love, march in different ways to one and the same goal—arousing, in their people, that sensible energy which creates goodness and beauty.

I was sad and vexed to see that Andreyev had distorted such a character, as yet untouched in Russian literature. It seemed to me that in the way the story had been conceived, that character should have found the appreciation and the tone worthy of it. We had a little argument, and perhaps I spoke rather sharply of the necessity of representing exactly certain—most rare and positive—phenomena of actuality.

Like all people of a definitely circumscribed "ego," with a keen perception of their "selfness," Leonid did not like being contradicted. He took offense, and we parted coldly.

In Capri

I believe it was in 1907 or 1908 that Andreyev arrived at Capri, after burying Lady Shura in Berlin. She died of puerperal fever. The death of this sensible and good friend reacted very painfully on Leonid's soul. All his thoughts and words centered in recollections of the senselessness of it.

"You understand," he said with strangely dilated pupils, "she was still alive as she lay in bed, but already her breath smelt of a corpse. It was a very ironical smell."

He wore a black velvet jacket, and even outwardly seemed crushed, downtrodden. His thoughts and words were eerily concentrated on the problem of death. It so happened that he settled down in the Villa Caraciollo which belonged to the widow of an artist, a descendant of the Marquis Caraciollo, that supporter of the French party who had been executed by Ferdinand Bomba. The dark rooms of that villa were damp and gloomy; on the walls hung unfinished grimy pictures that looked like mold stains. In one of the rooms was a large smoke-stained fireplace, and in front of the windows, shading them, grew a dense cluster of shrubs. From the walls of the house ivy crept in at the window panes. This room Leonid turned into his dining room.

One evening when I arrived I found him in a chair in front of the fireplace. Dressed in black and bathed in the purple glow of the smoldering coal, he held on his knees his little son Vadim, and in low tones, with sobs, was telling him something. I entered softly; it seemed to me that the boy was falling asleep. I sat down on a chair by the door, and I heard Leonid telling his son how Death stalked over the earth and mowed down little children.

"I'm frightened," Vadim said.

"Don't you want to hear?"

"I'm frightened," the boy repeated.

"Well, go to bed."

But the child pressed close to his father's knees and began crying. For long we could not manage to comfort him. Leonid was in a hysterical mood; his words irritated the boy, who stamped his feet and cried: "I don't want to sleep! I don't want to die!"

When his nurse took him away, I remarked that it was hardly necessary to frighten the boy with stories like that, stories about death, the invincible giant.

"But if I can't speak of anything else?" he said sharply. "At last I understand how indifferent 'beautiful Nature' is, and I want one thing only—to tear my portrait out of this frivolously pretty frame."

It was difficult, almost impossible, to speak to him. He was nervous, irritable, and it seemed as though he deliberately chafed his wound.

"The idea of suicide haunts me; it seems to me that my shadow crawls after me, whispering, 'Begone, die!' "

This aroused considerable anxiety among his friends; but now and then he would drop hints that he was consciously and deliberately creating this anxiety. It was as though he wished to hear once more what they had to say in justification and defense of life.

But the cheerful scenery of the island, the caressing beauty of the sea, and the genial attitude of the Caprians to the Russians, soon drove away Leonid's gloomy mood. In a few months he was seized, as by a whirlwind, with a passionate desire for work.

I remember one moonlight night, sitting on the beach by the sea, he said, with a shake of his head: "Basta! Tomorrow morning I'll begin to work!"

"The best thing you could do."

"Just so!"

And—a thing which he had not done for a long time—he began to talk cheerfully of his plans for new books.

"First of all, old fellow, I will write a story with the despotism of friendship for its subject. I'll pay off my score to you, you rascal!"

And instantly he began—easily and quickly—to weave a humorous story of two friends, one a dreamer, the other a mathematician. The one spends his whole life in the clouds, while the other, by carefully calculating the expense of these imaginary travels, decidedly kills once and for all the dreams of his friend.

But immediately afterward he said: "I want to write about Judas. When I was in Russia I read a poem about him, I don't remember by whom. It was very clever. What do you think of Judas?"

At that time I had a translation of Julius Wexel's tetralogy Judas and Christ, and a translation of Thor Hoedberg's story, also Golovanov's poem. I suggested that he should read them.

"I don't want to; I have an idea of my own, and they might muddle me. You had better tell me what they say. No, you had better not, don't tell me."

As was his way in moments of creative excitement, he jumped to his feet—he had to move about.

"Let's be off!"

On the way he gave me an account of his Judas, and in three days brought me the manuscript. With that story began one of the most productive periods of his creative activity. At Capri he thought out his play Black Masks, wrote the caustic satire Love of One's Neighbor, the story Darkness, created the plan of Sashka Zheguliov, sketched out his play Ocean, and wrote several chapters—two or three—of his long tale, My Memoirs, all these in the course of six months. These serious works and plans did not prevent Leonid from taking a lively part in composing the play Alas, a piece in the classical "people's theater" style, written partly in verse, partly in prose, with songs, dances, and all kinds of tortures perpetrated on the unfortunate Russian peasants. The plot of the play is clearly enough indicated by the list of dramatis personae:

Oppressum:	A merciless landlord.
Furiosa:	His wife.
Philisterius:	Brother to Oppressum, a prose littérateur.
Decadentius:	Unsuccessful son to Oppressum.
Endurance:	A peasant, very unhappy, but not always drunk.
Griefella:	Endurance's beloved wife, full of meekness and common sense, although pregnant.

Sufferalla:	Endurance's beautiful daughter.
Smackface:	A most horrible police constable (bathes in full uniform and all his medals).
Mangle:	An unmistakable village policeman, but, in fact, the noble Count Edmond de Ptie.
Kate:	Secretly married to the Count, the Spanish Marchioness Donna Carmen Intolerablia Detestablia, in fact disguised as a gitana.

The shadow of the Russian literary critic Skabichevsky.
The shadow of Koblitz-Usov.
Athanasius Schapov: in a perfectly sober state.
"We told you so": a group of persons without words or actions.

The play takes place in Skyblue Clay, Oppressum's estate, twice mortgaged to the Noblemen's Bank and once mortgaged somewhere else.

A whole act of this play had been worked out fully, saturated with delightful absurdities. Leonid wrote the prose dialogue, which was terribly funny, so droll indeed that he himself laughed like a child at his own inventions.

Never before or since have I seen him in a frame of mind so active, so unusually industrious. He renounced, as it were forever, his dislike for the process of writing; and he could sit at his table all day and all night, half-dressed, unkempt, cheerful. His imagination blazed wonderfully bright and productive; nearly every day he told me the plan of a new tale or story.

"Now at last I have taken myself in hand," he would say triumphantly.

And he inquired about the famous pirate Barbarossa, about Tommaso Aniello, about smugglers, Carbonari, about the life of Calabrian shepherds.

"What a multitude of subjects, what a diversity of life!" He was in raptures.

"Yes, these people have accumulated something for posterity. But with us: I picked up The Lives of the Russian Czars, and read that they ate. I tried to read The History of the Russian People—they suffered. I gave it up. The whole thing hurts and bores."

But, while the plans he related were full of color and substance, he composed carelessly. In the first version of his Judas several mistakes occurred which indicated that he had not even taken the trouble to read the New Testament. When he was told that Duke Spadaro sounds as absurd to an Italian as Prince Bashmatchnikov would to a Russian, and that St. Bernard dogs did not exist in the twelfth century, he was annoyed.

"These are trifles!" he objected.

"One can't say, 'They drink wine as camels,' without adding 'drink water.' "

"Rubbish!" he said.

He behaved to his talent as an indifferent rider treats a superb horse; he galloped it mercilessly, but did not love it, did not caress it. His hand had not the time to draw the intricate designs of his riotous imagination; he did not trouble to develop the power and dexterity of his hand. At moments he himself realized that this was a great hindrance to the normal growth of his talent.

"My language is ossifying. I feel it is getting more difficult for me to find the necessary words."

He tried to hypnotize the reader by the monotony of his phrasing, but his phrasing was losing the convincing quality of beauty. Wrapping his thought in the cotton wool of monotonously obscure words, he succeeded only in revealing it too much, and his stories read like popular dialogues on philosophical subjects.

Now and then, aware of this, he was vexed. "It is all cobweb, it sticks, but is not solid! Yes, I must read Flaubert. I believe you are right. Indeed he is a descendant of those mason geniuses who built the indestructible temples of the Middle Ages."

At Capri Leonid was told an episode of which he made use for his story Darkness. The hero of that episode was an old acquaintance of mine, a revolutionary. In reality the affair was very simple: a girl at a brothel, having guessed intuitively that her visitor was a revolutionary, hunted by detectives and driven to take shelter there from the pursuit of the political police, treated him with a mother's tender care and with the tact of a woman who still possesses the sense of respect for a hero. But the hero, a bookish man of clumsy soul, responded to the impulse of the woman's heart with a sermon on morality, thus reminding her of what she wanted to forget at the moment. Hurt by this, she smacked his face—a smack perfectly deserved, in my opinion. Then, having realized the whole crudity of his mistake, he apologized to her and kissed her hand—I think he might have omitted the kissing. That is all.

Sometimes, unfortunately very seldom, reality happens to be more truthful and more pleasant than even a very talented story that is based on it.

So it was in this case. But Leonid distorted the meaning as well as the form of the event out of recognition. In the actual brothel there was neither the agonizing and foul mockery at man, nor any of those weird details with which Andreyev has enriched the story so abundantly.

This distortion affected me very painfully: Leonid, as it were, revoked and annulled the feast which I had been awaiting long and hungrily. I know people too well not to appreciate very highly the least manifestation of a good, honest feeling. Certainly I could not help pointing out to Andreyev the meaning of his action, which to me was equivalent to murder for a mere whim, for a wicked whim. He reminded me of the freedom of the artist, but this did not change my attitude; even now I am not convinced that such rare manifestations of ideally human feelings should be arbitrarily distorted by the artist, for the gratification of a dogma he loves.

We talked long on this theme. But although our conversation bore a perfectly peaceful friendly character, still, from that moment something had snapped between him and me.

The end of that conversation is very memorable to me. "What are you trying for?" I asked Leonid.

"I don't know," he said, shrugging his shoulders and closing his eyes.

"But you certainly have some desire; either it is always there before all others, or it arises more often than all others."

"I don't know," he repeated. "I believe there is nothing of the sort. Sometimes, though, I feel that I need fame, much fame, as much as the whole world could give. Then I concentrate it in myself, condense it to its ultimate capacity, and when it has acquired the force of explosive matter, I explode, illuminating the world with a new light. And after that people will begin to live with a new mind. You see, what we need is a new mind, not this lying old swindler! He takes from me all the best of my flesh, all my feelings, and, promising to return them with interest, returns nothing, saying: 'Tomorrow! Evolution.' Then, when my patience is exhausted and the thirst for life stifles me, 'Revolution,' he says. And fondly goes on deceiving till I die, having received nothing."

"You must have belief, not reason."

"Perhaps. But if so, then first of all belief in myself."

He paced the room in agitation; then, sitting down on the table, waving his hand in front of my face, he went on: "I know that God and the Devil are mere symbols. But it seems to me that the whole life of man, all the meaning of it, consists in the infinite and boundless expansion of these symbols, fed with the flesh and blood of the world. And having invested these two opposites with all its powers—to the very last—mankind will disappear, but those two will become carnal realities and will go on living in the emptiness of the universe, face to face with one another, invincible, immortal. There is no sense in this? But there is none anywhere, in anything."

He grew pale, his lips trembled, stark terror shone in his eyes. Then he added in a low voice, feebly: "Let us imagine the Devil as woman, God as man, and let them beget a new being, certainly just as dual as you and I. Just as dual."

He left Capri unexpectedly. Only the day before he had said that he would sit down at his table and work for three months. But on the evening of the very same day he said to me: "You know, I have decided to leave this place. After all one must live in Russia. Here one is overcome by a kind of operatic levity; one wants to write vaudevilles, vaudevilles with songs. Life simply is not real here, it is an opera: there is more singing here than thinking. Romeo, Othello, and the rest of their kind—Shakespeare made them; the Italians are incapable of tragedy. Here neither Byron nor Poe could have been born."

"And what about Leopardi?"

"Well, Leopardi, who knows about him? He is one of those who are talked about, but not read."

As he left he said to me: "This, Alexeyushko, is also an Arzamas, a gay little Arzamas, no more than that."

"Don't you remember how it fascinated you?"

"Before marriage we are all fascinated. You will be leaving here soon? Do go away, it is time you went. You are beginning to look like a monk."

During the time I was living in Italy my mind was very uneasy on account of Russia. As early as 1911 people round me spoke confidently of the inevitability of an all-European war and of the certainty that that war would be fatal to the Russians. My uneasy mood was particularly heightened by facts which indicated beyond all doubt that in the spiritual world of the Great Russian people there lurked something morbidly obscure. Reading the volume on agrarian risings in the Central Russian provinces published by the Free Economic Society, I saw that those risings bore a particularly brutal and senseless character. An investigation of the crimes of the population of the Moscow Circuit, based on an examination of the reports of the Moscow High Court, astounded me by its revelation of the tendency of the criminal will, shown in the great number of cases of crimes against the person, violation of women, and rape of minors. Even before then I had been unpleasantly struck by the fact that, though in the Second State Duma there had been a very considerable number of priests, men of the purest Russian blood, these men had not produced a single talent, a single statesman. And there was a great deal more that confirmed my anxiously skeptical attitude toward the fate of the Great Russian race.

On my arrival in Finland I met Andreyev, and talking to him told him my cheerless thoughts. Hotly and even as though wounded by them he argued with me. But his arguments seemed to me unconvincing: he had no facts.

But suddenly lowering his voice, with his eyes screwed up, as though straining to look into the future, he began to talk of the Russian people in words unusual with him—abruptly, incoherently, and with great and undoubtedly sincere conviction.

I am unable, and if I could I should not like, to reproduce his words. Their force consisted not in their logic nor in their beauty, but in a feeling of tormented sympathy for the people, a feeling of which, in such force and in such expression, I had not thought Leonid capable.

He shook all over with nervous tension; and, crying, almost sobbing like a woman, he shouted: "You call Russian literature provincial because the majority of the great Russian writers are men of the Moscow province? Good, let us suppose so. But yet it is a world literature, it is the most serious and powerful creative activity of Europe. The genius of Dostoievsky alone is enough in itself to justify the senseless, even the out-and-out criminal life of the millions of the people. And suppose the people are spiritually sick—let us heal them and remember, as has been said, 'a pearl grows only in a diseased shell.' "

"And the beauty of the beast?" I asked.

"And the beauty of human endurance, of meekness and love?" he replied. And he went on to speak of the people, of literature, more and more ardently and passionately.

It was the first time he had spoken so passionately, so lyrically. Previously I had heard such strong expressions of his love applied only to talents congenial to his spirit—to Edgar Poe most frequently of all.

Soon after our conversation this filthy war broke out. Our attitudes, different toward it, divided me still further from Andreyev. We scarcely met; it was only in 1916, when he brought me his books, that we both once more deeply felt how much we had gone through and what old comrades we were. But, to avoid arguing, we could speak only of the past; the present erected between us a high wall of irreconcilable differences.

I shall not be violating the truth if I say that to me that wall was transparent and permeable; I saw behind it a big, original man, who for ten years had been very near to me, my sole friend in literary circles.

Differences of outlook ought not to affect sympathies; I never gave theories and opinions a prominent place in my relations to people.

Leonid Nikolaevich Andreyev felt otherwise. But I don't blame him for this; for he was what he wished to be and could not help being—a man of rare originality, rare talent, and manly enough in his seekings after truth.

Reminiscences of TOLSTOY, CHEKHOV, & ANDREYEV

INTRODUCTION BY MARK VAN DOREN

Gorky was a close friend of the three great contemporaries he here recalls. This book, based on his diaries and notes, on letters exchanged and on vivid memories of moments spent together, presents a unique portrait of each man, a portrait which only an intimate who was also a brilliant and perceptive writer could have achieved.

The reader can almost hear Tolstoy, with "the extraordinary beauty of his speech," as he talks to Gorky about God and science, about women, about the Russian aristocracy, about Gorky's own stories and his play The Lower Depths.

Here is Chekhov, with his tender and charming smile, who loved everything simple and hated banality, voicing his thoughts on teachers and lawyers and doctors, and writing letters to Gorky about Uncle Vanya and Cherry Orchard.

Leonid Andreyev appears as a man of originality, l tormented by alcoholism, sometimes wounding and ing those who loved him—including his wife, Shura a very appealing human being in spite of his weakn

For many years these Reminiscences have been un able. In his introduction to this collection Mark Van D says, "No book of its kind has ever, I still think, been be
